..OF..

CHAPTER I.

GEOGRAPHY, GEOLOGY— — NATURAL RESOURCES, ETC.

GEOGRAPHY.

The vigorous and rapidly growing young state of North Dakota is located on the northern boundary of the Federal Union, about midway between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and half way between the Gulf of Mexico and Hudson's bay. It is the heart of the continent. Its northern boundary is the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, which separates it from the Dominion of Canada. On the east it is bounded by the state of Minnesota, from which it is divided by the famous Red river of the North. It is bounded on the west by the meridian of one hundred and four degrees, five minutes west longitude from Greenwich, or twenty-four degrees west from Washington. The south boundary is the seventh standard parallel, which separates it from its sister state of South Dakota. From north to south it measures about two hundred and ten miles, and from east to west about three hundred and sixty, and has a total area of 74,312 square miles, or 47,569,680 acres. At present it contains some fifty-two counties, some of which are as yet unorganized.

The state has several marked geographical divisions, the principal of which are the Red river valley, the James or Dakota river valley, the Devil's Lake and Turtle Mountain regions, the Souris or Mouse river country, the Missouri slope and the west Missouri or northwest Dakota country. The Red River valley derives its name from the Red river of the North, a stream so called to distinguish it from another of the same name in the southern states. This valley, unlike many others in the country, is not a narrow swale or depression on the banks of the stream, but a broad, level plain from fifty to sixty miles wide, and high enough above the river generally to prevent overflow and afford the best of drainage, and yet it is bottom or alluvial land. In ancient times the site of the entire valley was an immense lake, as shown elsewhere, the waters of which, receding, left a rich black deposit, highly charged with decomposed organic matter. The Red river is formed near Wahpeton by the confluence of the Otter Tail and Bois de Sioux rivers. Flowing north in a deep but narrow channel, its course extremely crooked, it crosses the international boundary line and empties into Lake Winnipeg, its waters finally mingling with those of Hudson's bay, through Nelson river. The river is navigable from Grand Forks to its mouth, and prior to the coming of the railroads bore considerable traffic. Among its principal affluents within the state are the Cheyenne, Wild Rice, Maple, Goose, Turtle, Big Salt, Park, Pembina and others.

The state, besides, is well watered and well drained by other principal rivers and streams, among which is the mighty Missouri, which rolls its flood of muddy water from the Rocky mountains eastwardly, entering North Dakota north of the central point on its western border, near Fort Buford. A score of miles from here it receives the waters of the Yellowstone, one of its principal tributaries, and, with greatly augmented waters, cross the state diagonally, receiving, on its way, such affluents as the Little Knife, Little Missouri, Big Knife, Heart, Little Heart and Cannon Ball rivers, and many creeks, both large and small. It passes out of the state about the center of the south line, at the southwest corner of Emmons county. It is navigable for its entire length through the state.

The James river, familiarly called the "Jim" river by the inhabitants, is an important stream. It is the Riviere Jacques, of the French, the Te-han-san-san, of the Sioux, and also bears the name of the Dakota river. It has its source in Wells county, North Dakota, and though but a narrow stream winds on through both Dakotas for several hundred miles, emptying into the Missouri near Yankton. The Souris or Mouse river rises in and flows through a considerable part of the Dominion of Canada, and crosses into North Dakota about longitude 102 west from Greenwich. It flows in a wide sweep, ox-bowed in shape, through the northern part of the state, passing from thence back into Canada, about seventy miles east from where it enters, finally emptying into the Assiniboine river. The principal branch that empties its waters into the Mouse in North Dakota is the River des Lacs. These main rivers, with numerous creeks and branches, form the water system of the state.

The state has, also, a large number of beautiful lakes, the most remarkable of which is Minnewauken or Spirit Lake, known by the whites as Devil's Lake. This body of water, which is about forty miles long, varies in width from about three hundred feet to over six miles. Its waters, strongly impregnated with salt, magnesia, etc., reminding one of the ocean, are peculiarly clear and pellucid. In depth it varies, in some places being over one hundred feet deep. Most of the shore line is a gently shelving beach. It abounds in excellent fish of the pike family. Its principal subdivisions are known as Devil's Heart or Donohues, Tellers, West, Fort Totten, Creel, Lamorcaux, Mauvais, Mission and Hill's Bays. The lake has no apparent outlet, although it may have some underground connection with the Cheyenne river. It has but one considerable tributary, the Grand Coulee, which in dry seasons shrinks to comparative insignificance, but in the spring pours a torrent into the lake. The elevation of this body of water above mean tide is 1,423 feet, or 814 feet above the level of Lake Superior. Within half a dozen miles of it lies Sweetwater Lake, the waters of which, unlike its neighbor, is as clear and pure and sweet as the spring that gushes from the hillside. It covers about eight thousand acres in Ramsey county. Other lakes are Stump, Ellis, Red, Rush, Twin, Long, Horsehead, Spiritwood and Arrowwood lakes.

The Turtle mountains, in the northern part of the state, are about all the eminences that rise above the dignity of hills within North Dakota. They include an area of about eight hundred square miles along the international boundary line, and consist of ranges of hills, rising generally but a few hundred feet above the surrounding prairie. There are, however, several prominent peaks, the principal of which, Butte, St. Paul and Bear Butte, have an altitude of about 3,200 feet above tide water, but, as the surrounding land is high, their summits are but some 700 feet above the level of the plain. The Pembina mountains, in the northeast part of the state, are simply the outer terraces of the Red River valley, where the tributary streams break down from the higher table lands. The first rise facing the valley is about three hundred feet, and the second, about five miles further back, about the same. The slopes of both these mountains are covered with oak, ash, aspen and other deciduous trees. Besides these there are elevated buttes, sharp hills and other departures from the practically level character of the land. The principal of these are the Short Medicine Pole Hills, in Bowman county; Les Belles Pierre hills, on the Cannon Ball river; the Cheyenne hills, in Boreman county, and others.

TOPOGRAPHY, CLIMATE, ETC.

The general topography of North Dakota is that of a vast undulating plain. The great Plateau du Coteau du Missouri (plain of the hills of the Missouri) traverses, in a belt, the state diagonally, from the northwest to the southeast. This is not the high dividing ridge or water shed it was formerly supposed to be, but simply an immense elevated plain, something like the llano estacado, of Texas. It is broken, occasionally, by low hills, or ridges, and sometimes by sharp peaked buttes. The country west of the Missouri river is generally more broken by hills and buttes, but has the advantage of being much better watered by a considerable number of small streams whose banks are fringed with timber. Practically speaking, the eastern part of the state lacks, in a great degree, the natural timber of the western part. When the settlers first came here it was nearly a treeless but grassy waste. The surface, gently undulating, is generally smooth, and the sweeps of the ridges long and easy. The climate is not so severe and harsh as is the general impression to those who have never been within its borders. On this point one of the commissioners of immigration of Dakota officially says:

* * * Hundreds of miles north of this there is a country with winters no more severe than those of the north New England states and summers more suitable for the growing of grain. We are separated from that region by the forty-ninth parallel, an imaginary political boundary, which nature does not take into account. * * * Those who think Dakota is a section of the Arctic region slipped down out of place should look to the east. The south line of Dakota is the forty-third parallel of north latitude. Follow this line across the Atlantic and much of Europe will be found lying north of it. All of Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Great Britain are a full degree above the northern boundary of our great territory. Edinburgh, St. Petersburg, Stockholm and Christiana, in the midst of a swarming population, are on the parallel of Sitka, Alaska. England and the north of Europe are made habitable by the influence of the Gulf Stream. The Kuro-Siwo—the Black Ocean river of the Asiatic coast—or the Japanese current, gives the northwestern region the same mildness of climate that the Gulf Stream does to northern Europe, and why should not this country, like that, be filled with life and industry? Water heated off the coast of southern Asia sweeps across the Pacific ocean and tempers the climate of our western coast nearly up to the arctic circle. This river of warmth gives to British Columbia, Washington and Oregon winters so mild that ice is a scarce article, even in Sitka, while roses grow in gardens along the Pacific coast at Christmas time. Imparting its heat to the air, it passes over the Rocky mountains—much lower between the fortieth and fiftieth parallels than further south—and affects the climate of a region larger than the original United States. Comparisons of temperature made with the north Atlantic coast are most favorable to Dakota and Montana. The Missouri river at Fort Benton, Fort Buford, Bismarck and Pierre is clear of ice earlier than it is at Omaha. In the light of existing knowledge who will say that up to the sixtieth parallel this northwest is not as capable of being settled as Russia and Norway and Sweden south of that line?

Glance at the physical features of this portion of the continent and one will see a great plain sloping northward. It is the latitude of the continental water system. Nowhere else in the world is there such a succession of lakes and navigable rivers; no other country possesses such an area of agricultural land so intersected by fresh water. Within a radius of one thousand miles is half the fresh water of the globe. At Grand Forks the Red river is less than one thousand feet above the sea; follow the river to its mouth, Lake Winnipeg, and it has descended three hundred feet; and in a boat one can steam westward on the Saskatchewan more than one thousand miles, and then double the distance on other rivers.

Follow the Red river to its source in Lake Traverse, and in high water a boat can reach Big Stone lake, the source of the Minnesota, and there pass to the Mississippi, thus joining Hudson's bay and the Gulf of Mexico. Two hundred miles to the east is Lake Superior and a waterway to the Atlantic. Two hundred miles to the west the Missouri can be reached, and the traveler can be borne into the shadows of the Rocky mountains, from whose western side another mighty river springs—the Columbia—and leaps to a different sea. After the Mississippi and the Missouri, the Columbia drains the largest basin in the Republic.

From Lake Superior along the northern boundary of the Republic to the Pacific ocean, the average altitude is less than two thousand feet above the sea. It is the only line on which connected agricultural settlement can be made across the continent. It is the cereal belt, and history shows that mankind gathers in largest numbers where food is most abundant and cheapest. Southwest of here is the roof of the continent; the plains of Colorado are almost as high as the mountains of Montana; Denver, surrounded by productive farms, is a half mile higher than the average of Montana's valleys and plains. Between Omaha and Sacramento there is a continuous elevation of quite four thousand feet. Ascending every three hundred feet makes a difference of one degree in temperature.

GEOLOGY.

The geological structure of North Dakota does not cover a wide range, but has many interesting features. The 'great interior of the state seems to be entirely covered by immense strata of cretaceous deposits of the Quaternary and Tertiary ages. This formation spreads over nearly all the territory from the Red river to the Yellowstone. These were formed when the great inland sea covered this region. When eroded by the action of the rivers, particularly the Missouri, cliffs of an imperfect form of chalk, clay and limestone project from the bank. In fact, Von Bach, the eminent German scientist and geologist, says: "This great river (the Missouri) flows uninterruptedly from the foot of the Rocky mountains through strata of chalk, at least as far as the mouth of the Sioux river."

After the chalk deposits were made, "the glacial drift overwhelmed the country, tearing away the upper layers and deposited all the Tertiary or upper masses of boulders, gravel, clay, sand and lastly, the rich, black sedimentary loam which forms the arable land of the present day."

"The Red River Valley is leveled and filled with a deposit of several hundred feet of heavy blue clay, and no rock is found near the surface." So says A. W. Barber, the eminent geologist.

That the Cretaceous formation once extended over nearly the whole of the prairie region of Dakota, at the level of the few fragmentary uplifts, like the hills spoken of, is scarcely doubtful, from the disintegration of which we have the immense bluff deposits of the Missouri valley, and much of the alluvium of the great plains.

The Cretaceous formation in Dakota is divided into five groups by Meek and Hayden as follows: beginning at the lowest:

EARLIER CRETACEOUS.—1. Dakota Group.—Yellowish, reddish and whitish sandstones and clays, with lignite and fossil Augiospermous leaves; thickness, 400 feet. Location, southeastern Dakota.

2. Benton Group.—Gray, laminated clays, with some limestone; thickness, 800 feet. Near Fort Benton, and also near Great Bend.

3. Niobrara Group.—Grayish, calcareous matl; thickness, 200 feet. Bluffs on the Missouri, near Great Bend, etc.

LATER CRETACEOUS.—4. Pierre Group.—Plastic clays; thickness, 700 feet. Middle part barren of fossils. Location, near Pierre, west to the bad lands, Sage Creek, Cheyenne and White river regions.

5. Fox Hill Group.—Gray, ferruginous, and yellowish sandstones (very hard) and arenaceous clays; thickness, 500 feet. Location, Fox Hills, near Moreau river above Fort Pierre, etc.

As will be noticed, the Fox Hills belongs to the upper strata, and probably indicate a former common level of the country. Most of this portion has been denuded and carried away to form the later alluvium.

The imperfect chalk formation of the Missouri valley belongs to one of these Cretaceous groups, most probably the Benton. It is seen in the bluffs about Yankton, and also outcrops on the Dakota and Sioux rivers. In the quarry it is very moist and of a dark bluish color, but exposure to the atmosphere dries the moisture and changes its color to a creamy white appearance. It has been used for building purposes to a considerable extent in Yankton and some other places, and answers a very good purpose, though it is so soft and friable as to be easily whittled with a pocket knife. The atmosphere does not seem to affect it very seriously. This formation affords in various parts of the American continent cinnebar, coal, occasionally gold, copper and chromic iron. In New Jersey and other localities it furnishes a valuable fertilizer in the form of green sand, or glauconite, made up of silica, protoxyd of iron, potash, soda, lime and water. In the Black hills and some other portions of Dakota it affords very good building material, limestones and sandstones. This geological period was rich in various forms of life, both vegetable and animal. Among the former were more than a hundred varieties, including the oak, maple, sasafra, tulip, beech, sycamore, hickory, poplar and fig trees, as well as species of the redwood and palms. Among the animal life were the rhizopods, from which were formed the chalk beds, mollusks in numerous varieties, conchifers, gasteropods, cephalopods, etc., and vertebrates, including many fishes in great variety, including species of the shark family. Reptiles were, also, very numerous, and many of them of great size. Swimming reptiles from ten to seventy feet long, the gigantic hadrosaurus, nearly thirty feet long, resembling the iguanodon; and sea saurians reaching eighty feet in length. Gigantic turtles, the width across which, from tip to tip of their flippers, averaged fifteen or sixteen feet. There were, also, that singular creation, reptiles with wide-spreading wings, often with a breadth across the latter of twenty feet. This deposit, in Dakota, has been a mine of wealth to those seeking the fossils of the prehistoric and preglacial animal life. Many of the museums and institutes throughout the world include in their possessions large numbers of specimens from the drift beds of the Dakotas.

The Tertiary age, called by geologists the age of mammals, is magnificently developed, also, in Dakota, covering, for the most part, throughout the twin states, the cretaceous strata. Locked up in its embrace are found those fossils of the gigantic animals, the wonder of the scientific world. Some of the most perfect remains of the mammoth and his kindred giants have been found in the drifts and gravel of this deposit in Dakota. And the collection of these monstrous relics that contains none from this part of the American continent is counted as incomplete. On the geological maps of the United States surveys it is shown that the western part of North Dakota was once covered by the fresh water Miocene lake.

GEOLOGICAL AND NATURAL RESOURCES.

In economic geology North Dakota can make a proud showing in the future, when it has attained more development. Coal, natural gas, petroleum and building stone can be found within its wide-spread borders. Of the most important of these, coal, the commissioner of immigration of the territory of Dakota, in an official work published in 1887, says:

"A large part of north Dakota is underlain with a deposit of lignite or brown coal, which crops out in many places, in veins sometimes twenty feet in thickness. This lignite or brown coal is of a soft variety, excellent for heating purposes, and has been tested and found to possess gas-making qualities superior to almost any coal discovered on the continent. It is defined by minerologists to be of the most recent geological formations, post-Tertiary, more recent than the anthracite or bituminous coal of the carboniferous period.

"It retains, to a great extent, the texture of the wood from which it was formed, and in mining lignite vegetable matters are often met with in various stages of their conversion into mineral coal. Sometimes it is more altered in structure, so that its vegetable character is more indistinct; the beds presenting stratified bodies of dark, nearly black substance, with a conoidal fracture.

"The proportion of carbon in this variety of coal is found to vary, by different analyses, from fifty to seventy per cent.

"To Mr. C. W. Thompson, of Bismarck, who has had a lengthy experience in the mining and handling of Dakota coal, this office is indebted for the following analysis of lignite found in this locality: Moisture, 12.1; fixed carbon, 58.5; volatile, 27.0, and ash, 2.4; total, 100. Specific gravity, 1.30.

"While inferior to anthracite, or the best qualities of bituminous coal, lignite burns readily and furnishes the settlers of a prairie country with that inestimable boon, cheap domestic fuel. At present, because of the lack of transportation facilities, only the outcroppings are worked, and, generally, for the supply simply of the settlers of the immediate neighborhood. The completion of the north and south roads, already in course of construction, will place the immense coal fields of north Dakota within easy reach of every village, and a good quality of soft coal can then be had as low as $2 per ton, and even in the more distant towns not exceeding $4.50 per ton. Already at some points * * * especially on the Little Missouri, in Billings county, coal mining is carried on quite extensively and thousands of tons are shipped as far east as Jamestown. It is estimated that during the winter of 1886-7 ten thousand tons were shipped into the city of Bismarck alone, where it was retailed at $3.50, after paying a tribute of $1 per ton to the only railway line thus far reaching into the coal fields. Recent railroad developments will result, at an early day, in opening to markets the extensive coal areas surrounding the Devil's Lake, Turtle Mountain and Mouse river countries, as also of McLean, Mercer and Emmons counties, which contain some of the richest deposits of coal yet found, but are too distant from present railway facilities.

"In any one of the several counties of the north there is enough coal now in sight to supply the Territory with fuel for untold generations. Farmers haul wagon loads to the nearest towns the same as wood and sell it, the coal, at from one to two dollars a ton."

Another official document from the same office in 1889 has the following in regard to lignite coal in North Dakota:

"It is much better domestic fuel than wood. It is mined very cheaply from the outcroppings in the sides of the hills, and is more and more coming into general use as the common domestic fuel of the country. Lignite coal is largely mined for shipment at Sims, Morton county, and at Dickinson, Stark county, on the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is also mined for local consumption at New England City, in Hettinger county, and at all of the towns in each of the counties west of the Missouri river. It is also mined east of the Missouri river; at Cold Harbor and other places in McLean county; at the Hawley mine in Burleigh county; at several points in Emmons county; at several points in the Mouse river country and at the Pony Gulch mines in Wells county. Settlers in the region west of the Missouri river, where numerous outcroppings of coal are found in almost every township, are in the habit of mining their own fuel. A little work with pick and shovel uncovers a vein on the side of a hill from which a wagon can be loaded without much labor. Lignite coal is wood in the first conversion into coal. It retains to a great extent the texture of the wood from which it was formed, and its vegetable character can often be seen in the carbonized sections of limbs and trunks of trees. The proportion of carbon in this variety of coal will average about 50 per cent. The existence of these extensive coal beds is an important matter for the future development of North Dakota, and for the comfort and prosperity of the settlers, insuring them an ample supply of cheap fuel for all future time."

The following article in regard to the coal supply of North Dakota is clipped from the Grand Forks Daily Herald of June 27, 1899, and was prepared by Professor Babcock, of the State University:

"The existence of beds of lignite coal in North Dakota has been known for some time, but the extent of these beds and their ultimate value to the people of the state is appreciated by only a few. Though the area of the coal deposit is continually being increased by new finds, there is still, doubtless, a vast extent of coal in North Dakota of which nothing certain is yet known.

"It is quite probable that the coal deposits of North Dakota are of the east flank of the Rocky Mountain coal range, which has been followed over five hundred miles north and south. Whether the outcrop discovered are fragments of one large coal basin which has been broken up and covered with later formations or whether they are deposits of numerous woody swamps of the same geological period we may not determine. But it will be sufficient to say that North Dakota alone has without doubt coal enough to supply herself and her less fortunate neighboring states for years to come.

"The general direction of the coal deposits appear to be from north to south. The seams generally outcrop along the banks of streams or on the sides of a bluff leading to the valley below. The seam commonly worked appears from fifty to one hundred feet below the level of the surrounding country, and varies in thickness from seven to twenty feet. There is, usually, over or under this coal a layer of light colored clay, which may in some cases prove to be a fair fireclay. In some localities coal may be found below the layer now worked. In any case it is not to be expected that anthracite coal will be found in North Dakota, for the geology of the country can hardly permit it. It is conceded that anthracite varieties are associated with folding and metamorphism of strata.

"The coal of different localities varies somewhat in its physical as well as in its chemical properties. Most samples have a general appearance between that of cannel and brown coal. In one or two cases it approaches true bituminous coal.

"The deposits, for the most part, lie in the western and central portions of the state. A few miles west of Minot, Ward county, coal is found outcropping along the sides of the bluff. Indications are that the coal continues for some distance along the valley. Coal has been mined in two or three places in this locality.

"Going west of Minot, coal again appears in the western part of Flannery and Buford counties. About Williston there is evidently a considerable deposit. South of Williston, about Medora, Billings county, in the Bad Lands, coal is found but is not mined, so far as known. East of Medora, at and about Dickinson, there is a considerable amount of coal mined, especially from the large deposits of the Lehigh mine. In the banks along the valley from Sims, Morton county, to New Salem, coal is frequently seen. At Sims there are two or three places from which it has been mined. Coal occurs some distance north of Mandan, and along the Missouri river in McLean and Mercer counties there are said to be extensive beds. Near Dunseith, Rollett county, small deposits have been found on the southern slope of the Turtle mountains. A good quality of coal is found in Hettinger county.

"From the localities mentioned it will be seen that the coal deposits of the state must cover a very large area.

"A number of samples analyzed at the chemical laboratory of the State University gave the following average results:

Water and volatile matter.....	48.37
Fixed carbon .....	44.71
Ash .....	6.92

100.00

Sulphur .....	0.34
---------------	------

"The variety and value of coal depends mainly upon the purity and the proportion of the fixed carbon and volatile matter.

"The ash of North Dakota coal is generally not high. It is of a good color and very free from clinkers. The amount of sulphur is very small, in some cases being hardly more than a trace.

"For general heating purposes the value of coal is often approximated by the amount of fixed carbon it contains. From the analysis of North Dakota coal would be not far below that of a ton of carbon is 44.71. Analysis of several of the Iowa coals give 45.42 per cent. fixed carbon; of Indiana, 51.20; of Ohio, 58.10. Using this method of estimation the heating power of a ton of North Dakota coal would not be far below that of a ton of Iowa coal, about four-fifths of a ton of Indiana coal and about two-thirds of a ton of Ohio coal.

"As compared with wood there is no doubt that, for ordinary purpose, the coal is far superior at reasonable prices.

"The value of coal varies widely according to the use to which it is to be put. For some purposes this coal will not be good, but for general manufacture and heating purposes, in which most of the fuel is used, the coal of North Dakota is well adapted.

"North Dakota coal, though lignite, is of high grade. The statistics of Germany and Austria show that many millions of tons of this fuel are annually used in those countries for domestic and other purposes.

"It will probably not be long before improved methods of burning will largely increase the use of this coal. Fair tests cannot be made by burning lignite in the common anthracite or soft coal burner. Lignite should be used in a burner suited to its peculiar characteristics. It is understood that experimentation in this line has already resulted in the production of a burner which will make lignite a much more convenient and economical fuel. It can only be a matter of time when the people have become better acquainted with this coal, and the proper methods of burning, till it will be much more extensively used. Such a cheap and abundant supply of fuel will also help wonderfully in establishing various manufacturing industries."

Building stone of various kinds are found in the Turtle Mountain district, and boulders, remnants of the glacial period, are plentifully scattered over North Dakota.

The commissioner of immigration in 1887, says in his official report for that year:

"The discovery of valuable minerals has been announced from the Turtle Mountains, but coal, iron and oil are known to exist in quantities. A geological survey of the state would no doubt reveal wealth of which we now have no knowledge.

"Clays for brick making, pottery, etc., abound. At Dickinson, Stark county, an excellent cream-colored brick is made." The brick used in the state capitol at Bismarck is a native product, made from Dakota clay.

Natural gas in considerable quantities has been discovered at various places throughout both the Dakotas. The commissioner of immigration, in his compilation for 1887, says of this subject:

"Within the past year natural gas was found while sinking an artesian well at Jamestown, Stutsman county. The flow was sufficiently strong to force the gas through 1,300 feet of pipe filled with water to the surface of the ground, where, when lighted, it burned brightly with a flame over a foot in height. This seems to settle the question of the existence of a strong vein of natural gas underlying the James river valley. A syndicate of the most influential and wealthy citizens of Jamestown have organized a stock company with the determination of prosecuting the work of developing natural gas to a profitable end.

"In sinking wells in the oil fields to the west of the Black Hills a considerable flow of natural gas has always been encountered, though no attempt at a systematic investigation has ever been made.

"It would seem then that there is no foundation for reasonable doubt of the existence of large bodies of natural gas underlying the Missouri, James and Red river valleys."

The following conclusions by leading scientists as to where natural gas is liable to be found, are of interest. Professor Leslie, of Pennsylvania, says:

"Where the rock formations lie approximately horizontal and have remained nearly undisturbed over extensive areas, there is always a chance of finding gas (if not oil) at some depth beneath the surface, determined by the particular formation which appears at the surface. And, wherever rock oil has been found, there and in the surrounding region rock gas is sure to exist."

Professor Orton, state geologist of Ohio, in an elaborate report upon petroleum and inflammable gas, says that there is nothing to establish a rule that natural burning gas can be found only in the neighborhood of deposits of petroleum, and he cites the wells of Indiana, located entirely without the oil belt. Professor Orton lays down a rule of three conditions needful to the formation of a natural reservoir containing gas, viz.: A range of highly porous rock, through which the gas traverses, as through pipes; a large fissure into which it flows, and a cap, or lid of impervious rock or clay, which will prevent its escape from the reservoir. The Trenton, Berean and Magnesian limestone formations have furnished the first two conditions in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana. Other rocks may furnish it for other regions. The cap, or lid, is sometimes of shale, sometimes of dense, impervious limestone. The professor disproves the theory that natural gas is the product of the natural distillation of petroleum, but insists that the forces which make natural gas are at work universally, and therefore natural gas can be found almost everywhere."

So far the discoveries of natural gas in the state have been purely the result of accident, digging wells for water being the principal means, except for an experiment at Fargo, where a systematic effort to that end was made.

Surface indications of mica are found along the streams and in the hills very generally throughout the state, although the quality and quantity of the hidden deposits remain practically undemonstrated.

SOIL.

The soil of North Dakota presents considerable diversity, although generally of a high degree of fertility. In the famous Red river valley, claimed to be the garden spot of the north, it is a black alluvial mould. The valley, a broad, level plain from fifty to sixty miles wide, high enough above the river to prevent overflow, is still bottom land as far as the deposit of the soil is concerned. It is understood that it was anciently the bed of lake, and connected with Lake Winnipeg, and probably Hudson's bay. This richest of soil produces the celebrated "No. 1 hard" wheat and the valley is evidently a farmer's paradise. In the balance of the state the soil is the ordinary black prairie mould, full of organic matter, produced by the decay of vegetable material for centuries and exposure to the elements since the inception of the post-Tertiary period. This varies in composition, thickness and value in various localities, but in nearly, if not quite all, most fertile and most abundant. Its thickness above the sub-soil varies from two feet to twenty.

RAILROADS.

North Dakota for a new country is well supplied with means of transportation. The Northern Pacific Railroad spans it from east to west, touching such points as Fargo, Jamestown, Bismarck and many others. The Great Northern, formerly, the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba, also crosses the state from east to west, crossing the Red river of the North at Grand Forks, passing Devil's Lake and through many prominent cities and villages in the northern part of the state. This railroad has several branches, northerly and southerly from the main trunks, tapping the more thickly settled portions of the state. The Northern Pacific Railroad also has a number of lateral branches. The Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste Marie railroad crosses the state of North Dakota diagonally from southeast to northwest, the northernmost station being Portal, close to the international boundary line. It, also, has a branch in the southeastern part of the state. The Chicago & Northwestern Railroad has a short amount of trackage, also, within the state. A full detail of these various roads with their history is included in this work under the head of railroads, to which the reader is referred.

CHAPTER II.

DISCOVERY AND EARLY HISTORY OF THE PROVINCE OF LOUISIANA; EARLY EXPLORERS; PURCHASE BY THE UNITED STATES; DIVISION INTO STATES AND TERRITORIES; BIRTH OF DAKOTA.

At the dawn of the nineteenth century the territory now embraced in the state of North Dakota formed a part of the province of Louisiana, then belonging to Spain. At the close of the Revolutionary war the United States was bounded on the west by the Mississippi river from its course south to the thirty-first parallel of north latitude. This latter formed the boundary between the States and the Spanish provinces of Florida. It is related that in 1542, Ferdinand De Soto, with a band of Spanish adventurers, under commission from the king of his native land, discovered the Mississippi at the mouth of the Ouachita river. After the sudden death of their leader, in May of that year, his followers, after burying his body in the river, built a small vessel, and in July, 1543, descended the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico. Thus the mouth of this mighty river was discovered one hundred and thirty years prior to the discovery of its upper valley by the French missionary priests.

By virtue of this and the conquest of Florida, Spain claimed the country bordering on the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico but made no attempt to colonize it permanently. At that time it was understood by the various European states that the discovery and occupation of any part of the New World made a title to the country. Although thus taken possession of by Spain, the failure of that power to consummate its discovery by planting colonies or settlements, made their title void, and the country was left to be re-discovered and taken possession of by other powers.

Early in the seventeenth century the religious zeal of the French missionary priests led them to penetrate from Quebec, the vast forests and plains of the west and southwest of the French possessions in North America. Along the river of St. Lawrence, through the chain of Great Lakes to the Mississippi pushed their way, establishing missions and endeavoring to win the Indians to the true faith. This movement began in 1611 when Father La Caron, a Franciscan friar, the friend and companion of Champlain, the father of the French settlements in Canada, made a journey to the rivers of Lake Huron on foot and by paddling a birch bark canoe. In 1632, on the establishment of the government of New France, under the charter of Louis XIII and his great prime minister, Cardinal Richelieu, the work of converting the heathen Indians passed from the Order of St.

Francis to that of Loyola, the famed Jesuits. Burning with pious zeal and animated with a spirit of self-sacrifice rarely, if ever, paralleled in the history of missionary work, these latter, simple priests, penetrated the wilds of the Canadian frontier and through toil and pain, often to martyrdom, carried the cross to the remote tribes of the Mississippi and its tributaries. Bancroft the historian says: "The history of their labors is connected with the origin of every celebrated town in the annals of French America; not a cape was turned, nor a river entered, but a Jesuit led the way."

In 1634, the Jesuits, Brebeuf and Daniels, followed by Lallemand, made a journey into the far west. Joining a party of Huron Indians who had been in Quebec and who were returning to their homes, they pushed their way enduring without complaint untold fatigues and sufferings, by lake, river and forests. They penetrated to the heart of the Huron wilderness. Near the shores of Lake Iroquois, was raised the first house of the Society of Jesus in all that region and soon two villages named St. Louis and St. Ignatius sprang up amid the forests that were the homes of the savage. The mission of Brebeuf gave to the world its first knowledge of the water courses of the St. Lawrence valley. From a map published in France in 1660, it is shown that these pious priests had explored the country from the waters of the Niagara to the head of Lake Superior, and had heard or seen the shores of Lake Michigan.

As early as 1635, Jean Nicolet, who had been one of Champlain's interpreters, and who had come to Canada from his native France in 1618, reached the western shores of Lake Michigan. In the summer of 1634 he ascended the St. Lawrence with a party of Hurons and during the following winter traded with the Indians at what is now Green Bay, Wisconsin. In 1635 he returned to Canada. He was married at Quebec, October 7, 1637, and lived at Three Rivers until 1642, when he died. Of him it is said in a letter written in 1640, that he had penetrated the farthest into these distant countries, and if he had proceeded "three days more on a great river which flows from that lake (Green Bay) he would have found the sea," for such was a common belief in those days.

The hostility of the Iroquois or Five Nations, a fierce and bloodthirsty confederation of savages, prevented the journey of Raymbault and Picard to the west in 1640, but the following year, at the Great Feast of the Dead, held by the Algonquins, at Lake Nipising, the Jesuits were invited to visit the land of the Ojibway or Chippewa Indians at what is now Sault Sainte Marie. Accordingly September 17, 1641, Fathers Raymbault and Jogues left the Bay of Penetanguishene in a bark canoe for the rendezvous, where, after a passage of seven days, they met two thousand Indians who had assembled to meet them.

At this meeting the worthy fathers learned of many as yet unheard-of savage tribes and nations. This was the first mention of the Dakotahs, called in the Ojibway tongue Nadouechiouec, or Nadouessioux. The latter name, abbreviated by the French, forms the present name of these fierce nomads of the north, Sioux. Thus it is truly said that "the French were looking toward the homes of the Sioux, in the Great Valley of the Mississippi, five years before the New England Eliot had addressed the tribes of Indians that dwelt within six miles of Boston Harbor. In the ardor of his enthusiasm for discovery Raymbault expected to reach the Pacific Ocean, then supposed to be but a few hundred miles west of the Mississippi. However he was laid low by the hand of death, his sickness being brought on by hardships, dying in 1642.

In August, 1654, two fur traders joined a band of Ottawas and ventured upon a long voyage into the far west. In two years they returned with some fifty canoes and two hundred and fifty natives. They described the vast lakes and rivers of the west and the tribes whose homes stretched away to the northern sea, and spoke of the Sioux who dwelt beyond Lake Superior, and who wanted to trade with the white people. About this time two French adventurers made trips through the north-western wilderness. These were Medard Chouart known as Sieur Grosseiliers and Pierre D'Esprit, called Sieur Radisson. These two arrived at Chagoumikon, on the bay of the same name, in Wisconsin, not far from where the city of Bayfield now stands. From there they journeyed north and west and passed and passed the winter of 1659-60 among the Dakotahs.

In 1660, the superior of the Jesuits at Quebec, learning of the many savage tribes to the west of the mission, and burning with zeal for the advancement of the cause of Christ and the conversion of the heathen, sent Father Rene Menard, as an apostle among the red men. "His hair whitened by age, his mind ripened by long experience, and acquainted with the peculiarities of the Indian character, he seemed the man for the mission."

The night previous to his departure sleep deserted the eyes of the venerable priest. He knew that he was going into the land of a savage, ruthless barbarian, and he thought of his friends. Two hours past midnight, during his lonesome vigil, he penned a letter, the pious simplicity of which embalms it in the hearts of all. Early in the morning of the 28th of August, 1660, he, in company with a half a dozen other white men, departed from Three Rivers. October 15th he arrived at a bay on Lake Superior, to which he gave the name of Ste. Theresa, its discovery occurring on her fete day. They remained here all winter, hard pressed for want of food, being driven to all sorts of shifts to avoid starvation. At last, having received an invitation to visit them from the Hurons and Ottawas, Father Menard started for their villages, at the Isle of St. Michael. In some way he wandered from his guide, and perished in some unknown manner. Relics of him were found in Sac and Sioux villages many years afterwards but no tale of how he died or where came to the waiting ears of his friends.

In the summer of 1663, the mournful news of the death of Father Menard reached Quebec. His successor was soon found, for the impassive obedience of the Order of Loyola brooked no opposition to the command of a superior. Father Claude Allouez was chosen to carry the cross to these heathens and to follow in the footsteps of Father Menard. Impatiently waiting for the chance to proceed to his work, he was unable to find conveyance until the summer of 1665 when, in company with six of his own race and color and four hundred savages, he started. He built a mission at La Pointe, on Lake Superior, where he taught the simple natives his religion, and took up his work among them. While here he was the first to hear the name of a mighty river, the rival of the St. Lawrence, that flowed to the west of his station to which the Indians gave the name of Messipi.

September 13, 1669, Father Allouez having grown discouraged and gone to pastures new, the renowned Father Marquette arrived at La Pointe to take his place.

The purpose of discovering the Mississippi, about which the nations of Indians had told so much, seemed to have originated with Father Marquette in the same year of his reaching the mission of the Holy Ghost, at La Pointe. The year previous, he and Father Claude Dablon had established the Mission of St. Mary's within what is now Michigan. Circumstances about this time were favorable to a voyage of discovery among the Indian. The protection afforded to the Algonquins or the west by the commerce with New France as Canada was then called, which had grown up, had confirmed their attachment, and created a political interest which extended to France and to Colbert, the able financier of Louis XIV, and that monarch himself. The Intendent, Talon, determined to extend the power of France to the utmost borders of Canada, and for this purpose Nicholas Perrot was dispatched to the west as an emissary. The latter proposed a congress or convention of Indian nations at St. Mary's Mission, and the invitation to attend extended to all both far and near. Perrot arrived and in May, 1671, there assembled at the falls of St. Mary, a great gathering of Indians from all parts of the northwest. From the head waters of the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi, from the great lakes and the prairies beyond, and from the valley of the Red river of the North, they came, and it was announced that there should be peace, and that they were all under the protection of France.

In the same year Pere, or Father Marquette, gathered the remains of one branch of the Hurons at Point St. Ignace, which establishment was long considered the key to the West. The countries south of this had been explored by Fathers Allouez and Dablon, who had borne the cross through western Wisconsin and northern Illinois, visiting all the tribes of those localities.

The grand enterprise of the discovering of the Mississippi river was now on hand. May 13, 1673, Marquette and Joliet with five Frenchmen from Canada, set out from the mission on their daring and adventurous enterprise of exploring the country and finding out about the strange people of the unknown West. The Indians gathered to witness their departure, and, astonished at their temerity, attempted to dissuade them from attempting it. They alleged that the Indians of the Mississippi were a savage and cruel race, and that the river was the abode of all sorts of monsters and demons that were sure to destroy any one who dared to move upon the waters. Of course these tales did not terrify Marquette or Joliet, and these bold spirits, one led on by religious zeal, the other by pure spirit of adventure, parted from their friends and started on their trip.

By the way of Green Bay they entered the Fox river which they ascended till they came to a village of the Miamis and Kickapoos, the extreme point to which the explorations of the French had, as yet, extended. Here Marquette was delighted to find "a beautiful cross planted in the middle of the town, ornamented with white skins, red girdles, and bows and arrows, which those good people had offered to the Great Manitou, or God, to thank him for the pity he had bestowed on them during the winter, in having given them an abundant chase."

On assembling the chiefs and medicine men of the village, Marquette made them a speech telling them that Joliet had been sent by the Governor of Canada to discover new countries, and himself by God to spread the light of the Gospel. He added that he feared not death or exposure to which he expected to be called on to endure. From here, under the guidance of two Miami Indians, the expedition departed to cross the portage that separated the Fox and the Wisconsin rivers. On reaching the latter stream the guides left them and they pushed their way down the rapid waters of the Wisconsin to its mouth, reaching the Mississippi early in June, 1673. They sailed down the river until they reached the mouth of the Illinois. Up this latter stream they paddled their way through a virgin land, encountering many privations. In time they reached the forks of the Kankakee and Desplaines, and following the latter reached the Chicago river and Lake Michigan.

The rediscovery of the lower Mississippi remained for the gallant, daring and indefatigable LaSalle, to whose labors, privations and enterprise the French settlements in the Mississippi valley were so largely indebted. LaSalle was a poor man, for having relinquished his patrimony on entering the Society of Jesus, on his honorable retirement from that order had nothing. In 1667, having in the meantime crossed the seas to the New World in search of fortune, he appeared as a fur-trader, near what is now the city of Montreal. His business led him to explore both Lakes Ontario and Erie. Full of enthusiasm for discovery and the colonization of the west, he returned to his native land in search of help and authority. He received the title of Chevalier, and considerable grants of land in Canada. He returned in 1678 and the same year conveyed a party from Fort Frontenac (now Kingston, Canada), to the neighborhood of Niagara Falls, in a vessel of ten tons. This was the first craft that ever sailed up the Niagara river. In 1679 he launched a vessel of some seventy tons burden. On the 7th of August, amid salvos of artillery, the chants of a Te Deum, and the plaudits of the people and Indians, he sailed from the little harbor. He passed through Lake Erie and through the Detroit river into Lake Huron. Onward through the straits of Mackinac into Lake Michigan his little vessel ploughed its way, being the first sail craft on its blue waters. Coasting down its western coast, LaSalle, in his vessel Griffin, came to anchor at Green Bay. He had named his little ship in honor of the coat of arms of his patron, Frontenac, Governor of Canada. It was LaSalle's intention to utilize his vessel in a regular commerce with the Indians, but he was doomed to disappointment. Having loaded the Griffin with furs and peltries he ordered her crew to return with her to the Niagara river. He journeyed down to the head of Lake Michigan, and passing up the St. Joseph river, discovered a portage over swamps and logs to the Kankakee. He followed the latter river to the Illinois, and the last named stream as far as where Peoria now stands. Misfortunes now accumulated on the head of LaSalle. His vessel was wrecked on its voyage down the lakes and its stores of furs and pelts totally lost, and the expected stores, upon which he had depended to found and keep his colony did not come. The men that were with him grew discontented and almost deserted him. Like a man, and a brave and energetic one, he went to work to carry out the object which he had come so far to do. He built a fort just below Lake Peoria, to which he gave the appropriate name of Creveceur, Broken Heart. He sent Father Hennepin on his well known voyage up the Mississippi, an expedition upon which the father was the first European to gaze upon the upper river and the falls of St. Anthony. LaSalle set his men to work to build a barge or boat in which to descend the river, but as sails and cordage were necessary he determined to make the journey back to Canada on foot, in the depth of winter, and with no food or drink except what the chase or the creeks and streams could supply. Accordingly, leaving all his companions, except three, he started on this almost unparalleled journey. He accomplished his mission, but on returning to the fort which he had built, he found Tonti, whom he had left in command, and who he had ordered to build a new fort on the bluff, had, on being assaulted by a band of Indians, fled to a village of the Pottawatomies on Lake Michigan. After wasting some time in a fruitless search for his men, LaSalle finally started on his long voyage down the Illinois and the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico. April 9, 1682, he took possession of the whole country watered by the great river from its source to its mouth, in the name of the King of France, Louis XIV.

Thus was the Mississippi, in its lower course, re-discovered and taken possession of as French territory. LaSalle called the vast empire which he had thus added to the French colony, Louisiana, in honor of the King, and the great river Colbert, after the minister of finance of his native land, at that time one of the foremost men of Europe. He erected a column and a cross near the mouth of the river bearing a leaden plate with the inscription:

"Louis the Great, King of France and Navarre, Reigning April 9, 1682."

He found the three channels of the delta whereby the river empties into the Gulf of Mexico, and in May, 1683, returned to France to make report of his discovery. In 1685 he came once more from the latter country with a fleet and emigrants to colonize the country he had just discovered. Owing to the flat, level country, where land mingled with the water in marsh and swamp that spread for so many miles along the north coast of the Gulf, he was unable to find the mouth of the river. After beating about for some time in the search, he was finally abandoned by Beaujeau, who commanded a part of the fleet, who returned to France. With his store ship and two hundred and thirty emigrants LaSalle was driven ashore and wrecked in Matagorda bay, in what is now the state of Texas. LaSalle hastily constructed a fort of the scattered timbers of the vessel, and formed a colony to which he gave the name of St. Louis. This settlement, made as by an accident, made Texas a part of Louisiana.

After a fruitless search, that extended over four months, in search of the river mouth, which he conducted in canoes, the restless LaSalle, in April, 1686, turned his steps toward New Mexico, with twenty companions, hoping to find the rich gold mines of that country, the Eldorado of the Spanish. The colony did not prosper in his absence, and on his return thither he found it reduced to about forty persons. He determined to travel to his settlements in Illinois and Canada on foot across the continent, and bring back emigrants and supplies. January 12, 1687, he started with sixteen men, leaving the fort and settlement in charge of Sieur Barbier. The little party passed the basin of the Colorado and reached a branch of the Trinity river, where, March 20, 1687, the brave and gallant LaSalle was assassinated by three of his own party. One of his biographers, who calls him, truly, the father of the French settlements in Louisiana, says, "Not a hint appears in any writer that has come under our notice that casts a shade upon his integrity and honor. Cool and intrepid at all times, never yielding for a moment to despair, or even to despondency, he bore the heavy burdens of his calamities to the end; and his hopes only expired with his last breath."

In the meantime Father Louis Hennepin, a priest of the Recollect order of the Franciscans, who had been sent by LaSalle to explore the head waters of the Mississippi, in 1680, was making discoveries that have placed his name among the foremost of explorers. He was a native of Ath, in the Netherlands, and having a strong desire to travel embraced the church, then, next to the army, the surest road to advancement. For several years he led a wandering life in the discharge of his priestly duties. In 1676 he received orders from his superior to embark for Canada, a welcome announcement. On the ship that brought him across the seas was the gallant LaSalle with whom he contracted a friendship. After landing he resumed his labors in the church, and after many adventures finally went with LaSalle up the Niagara river. His description and drawing of the majestic falls, in that stream, were the first to reach Europe.

He sailed on the Griffin with LaSalle and remained with that leader until the building of Fort Crevecoeur. In February, 1680, he was selected with two companions, to explore the Upper Mississippi, and on the 19th of that month, with Picard de Gay and Michael Ako, turned the prow of his canoe toward the great river's upper course. The little party was detained by floating ice at the mouth of the Illinois river. On their way up the river they fell in with a war party of Dacotahs or Sioux, who took them along with them. In their company they journeyed northward, and finally after much fatigues and privation were enabled to discover the falls of the Mississippi to which Father Hennepin gave the name of St. Anthony. He afterwards returned to Europe, and published a book at Utrecht, in 1698, but died in obscurity, unwept and unhonored, as he had obtained a reputation for mendacity and double dealing, perhaps undeserved, although some modern writers think it the proper thing to deny him the credit that is his due.

Other discoveries were made in the north about the same time. The first trading posts on Lake Superior, beyond Sault Ste. Marie, were built of pine logs by Daniel Greysolon, Sieur du Luth, or DuLut, a native of Lyons, France, at Kamanistigoya, north-east of Pigeon river, Minnesota. He advanced as far as the Lake of the Issati, now Mille Lac, which he named Lake Buade, from the family name of M. de Frontenac, governor general of New France.

At the close of the seventeenth century, France, by right of discovery and occupation, claimed not only Canada and Nova Scotia, then known as New France and Acadia, and Hudson's Bay and New Foundland, but parts of Maine, Vermont and New York, together with the whole of the Mississippi valley, and possessions on the Gulf of Mexico, including Texas as far south as the Rio del Norte. The English revolution of 1688, when William of Orange succeeded James II upon the throne of England, and the peace of Ryswick in 1697, did not affect these possessions of France in the New World. At the period of the close of the great war which had just closed upon European soil by the above treaty in which so many powers were included, none of the possessions of France in the New World engaged the attention of that power so much as Louisiana. In 1697 D'Iberville still further aroused the attention of the ministry of the colony, and inspired the Count de Ponchartrain with the idea of building a fort and making a settlement at the mouth of the Mississippi. Two vessels were fitted out, one under the command of the Marquis de Chateau-Morand, and the other under D'Iberville. They left France in October, 1698, to find the mouth of the river, and after touching at Pensacola, March 2, 1699, entered the delta of the Mississippi. De Chateau-Morand went back to the island of St. Domingo, but D'Iberville ascended the river as far as what is now known as Bayou Gouta. At this point he met an Indian chief who handed him a letter, which was written by Tonti, the man who had left his post at Fort Creve-cœur, where he was placed by LaSalle, and was addressed to the latter as governor of Louisiana. It read as follows:

"Sir:—Having found the post on which you had set up the King's arms thrown down by the drift-wood, I caused another one to be fixed on this side, about seven leagues from the sea, where I have left a letter in a tree by the side of it. All the nations have smoked the calumet with me; they are people who fear us exceedingly since you had captured this village. I conclude by saying it is a great grief to me that we will return with the ill fortune of not having found you, after we had coasted with two canoes thirty leagues on the Mexican side and twenty-five on that of Florida.

The receipt of this letter was twelve years after the death of LaSalle, and nineteen years after he and Tonti had parted at the Peoria fort. Neither knew what had become of the other. Both had sought the other unavailingly. The letter is interesting as shedding light on Tonti's conduct and also as peculiar that the Indian chief had preserved it for so long a time.

D'Iberville descended the river and went to the Bay of Biloxi, between the Mississippi and Mobile rivers, where he erected a fort. Missions, trading posts and small settlements began to be founded from this time on in that province. As early as 1712 land titles were issued as far north as Kaskaskia, in what is now Illinois, and regular trade channels were opened between Canada and Louisiana.

Settlements now arose along the Mississippi at various points from the mouth of the Illinois river southward. The French determined to circumvent the English colonies on the Atlantic coast by building a line of forts from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, as once suggested to the French government by LaSalle. Part of this plan was carried into execution. Fort Chartres was constructed on the east bank of the Mississippi about sixty-five miles south of the mouth of the Missouri. This was one of the strongest fortresses on the continent at the time, and its ruins were to be seen a hundred years later. It was the headquarters of the commandant of Louisiana. Shortly after that the villages of Cahokia, Prairie du Rocher and others sprang into existence. A monastery and college was established in 1721, at Kaskaskia, a very important post in what is now the state of Illinois. The French laid claim to all the great Mississippi valley at this time. "France," says Bancroft, "had obtained, under Providence, the guardianship of this immense district of country, not, as it proved, for her own benefit, but rather as a trustee for the infant nation by which it was one day to be inherited."

By the treaty of the Utrecht, in 1713, France ceded to England her possessions in Hudson's bay, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. France still retained Canada and Louisiana. In 1711 the affairs of the latter were placed in charge of a governor-general, but this only lasted one year. The colony, not meeting the expectations of the government of the mother country, in 1712 was farmed out to a company to be carried on by private capital. Anthony Crozat, a wealthy merchant of Paris, undertook to handle it as a commercial affair, but failed. Every Spanish port on the gulf was closed to his commerce, and the occupation of Louisiana deemed an encroachment upon Spanish rights by that proud nation. He finally, after continued struggles, in 1717, surrendered his charter.

The Mississippi Company, one of those visionary schemes of that dreamer, John Law, was inaugurated the same year. Its charter invested it with the entire commerce of Louisiana and of New France, with authority to enforce its rights. In 1718 the company became recognized as the Royal Bank of France, and the following year, by virtue of the gaining of the monopoly of the trade with the East Indies and the south seas, became the Company of the Indies.

In 1718 the new company sent eight hundred emigrants to Louisiana. These people Governor Bienville settled at what is now New Orleans, but three years later the remainder of this force, some two hundred, were found still encamped on the site of the future city, they not having energy enough to build houses for themselves. The larger part had died on account of the climate and malaria, so prevalent in that locality. In May, 1720, the bubble burst, the Law Company went into bankruptcy, impoverishing France, both in its public funds and private fortunes. The effect on the infant settlements in the New World were more disastrous, if it were possible. The principal occupation of the French settlers, like their Spanish neighbors, was the search for immense mines of gold and silver, for which they neglected the enormous natural agricultural resources of the country, now the granary of the world and source of supply of the larger part of the cotton and sugar of commerce. The contrast was strong between the colonists of the Latin races and those of Anglo-Saxon origin.

In 1719 there arrived in Illinois one Phillippe Francois Renault, who had been appointed director-general of the mines of Louisiana. With him he brought two hundred miners and artisans. The extent of the country explored at that time embraced the headwaters of the Minnesota and the Red river of the North, the Arkansas, the tributaries of the Missouri and even extended to the Rocky mountains.

About this time hostilities with the Indians broke out, and a war with Spain threatened the lower part of the territory. From 1712 until 1746 the settlers in Louisiana fought with the savages. In the latter year, at Butte des Morts and on the Wisconsin river, the Fox Indians were defeated and driven westward. During this time, in 1729, the Natchez, Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians rose and massacred all within their reach. Military operations against them were taken. The Choctaws were detached from the confederacy by the diplomacy of Le Sueur, the famous explorer, and the Natchez defeated. Their chief, Great Sun, and four hundred of his people were taken prisoners and sold as slaves in Hispaniola, now the island of San Domingo and Hayti. Thus perished this interesting tribe who were, at the time, semi-civilized.

April 10, 1732, the control of the commerce of Louisiana reverted to the crown of France, and in 1735 Bienville returned as governor for the king.

In 1753 the first actual conflict arose between Louisiana and the English colonies on the Atlantic coast. A jealousy and rivalry had long existed. The French exerted every effort to prevent the other colonists from attempting to extend their settlements toward the Mississippi. The avowal was made for the purpose of seizing and punishing any Englishman found in the Ohio or Mississippi valleys. To carry out their purpose the French seized upon a piece of territory claimed by Virginia, and, alive to their interests, protests were made by the colonists of Virginia, Pennsylvania and New York. In 1753 Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, sent George Washington, then a young man of twenty-one years, to the French commandant to demand by what right he invaded British soil in time of peace between England and France. Gardeur de St. Pierre, the French officer in command, was met near the headwaters of the Allegheny by the young colonist, after a difficult winter journey. Washington, on stating his demands, received the insolent answer that they would not discuss right, but that as they had discovered the country they would hold it.

On the return of Washington, in January, 1754, he made his report. Forces were raised and under Colonel Washington marched upon the enemy. He had an action in western Pennsylvania with some of the French troops in which ten of the latter, with their commander, Jumonville, were killed. Some twenty French were made prisoners. The French, receiving reinforcements, Washington was forced to fall back, and at Green Meadows erected a rude stockade, which he called Fort Necessity. Here he was, shortly after, confronted by a French force of six hundred men with a hundred or more Indians, and on the 3d of July was forced to capitulate. On the 4th of July, 1754, the English troops withdrew from the Ohio valley. War between England and France broke out in May, 1755. This war in the new world lasted, with various fortunes, until the 10th of February, 1763, when the treaty of Paris was signed. By this instrument France renounced all her title to New France, now Canada, and all of the land lying east of the Mississippi river, except the island and town of New Orleans. On the same day by a secret treaty France ceded to Spain all her possessions of Louisiana, including the whole country to the headwaters of the Mississippi and west to the crest of the Rocky mountains.

At the treaty of peace between England and the United Colonies, at the close of the Revolutionary war in 1783, the former ceded to the latter all possessions on the east side of the Mississippi. At the same time the British government ceded to Spain all the Floridas, including all territory east of Louisiana and south of the southern limits of the colonies just freed.

At an early period after the conclusion of peace the people of the United States began to demand the free navigation of the Mississippi. The Spanish power, holding one bank entirely and both part of its course, held that they had exclusive use of it and demanded heavy tolls on all imports south of the mouth of the Ohio. This was a vexed question at the time and came, at one period, near to disrupting the country, the intrigues of Miro and Carondelet, the Spanish governors, tending to the separation of the western colonies from the eastern. All these questions were quieted by the treaty of Madrid, October 20, 1795, by which the free navigation of the river was assured, and the use of New Orleans at a port of entry or deposit. October 16, 1802, these rights were revoked by Morales, then intendant of Louisiana, but this action was not acquiesced in by the governor. Indignation ran high in the United States at this time over the matter. To effectually secure the rights of the United States in the navigation and commerce of the Mississippi, President Thomas Jefferson, in January, 1803, sent a message to the senate of the United States, nominating Robert R. Livingston and James Monroe ministers to the court of France, with full authority to conclude a treaty to that end. By a treaty dated at Madrid March 21, 1801, all the territory of Louisiana had been ceded back to France, the latter republic, by the hands of her glorious first consul, having in return placed the son-in-law of the king of Spain, the Prince of Parma, upon the throne of the new kingdom of Euria. The newly accredited ministers arrived in Paris at a critical time. The hollow peace, which followed the treaty of Amiens, between England and France, was strained to its utmost limit. Negotiations were commenced with the French cabinet. War between the two great naval powers broke out May 22, 1803, and Napoleon, who had been just made consul for life, to quote the words of M. Theirs, in his history of the consulate and empire, "sent for M. Marbois, the secretary of finance, and to him broached the idea of selling to the United States outright the province of Louisiana." This he did for the twofold reason of obtaining money for his war operations and to cast a bone of contention between England and the United States—"to gain the friendship of the people of America," as he said. Messrs. Livingston and Monroe, not dismayed at their want of powers to sign any such treaty, entered into a stipulation, subject of course to the ratification of their government. By the terms of this paper France ceded to the United States the whole province of Louisiana for which she was to receive the sum of fifteen million of dollars, and the United States assumed, also, the payment of certain claims against the French government. These latter were by merchants and ship-owners of the United States who had suffered loss from the seizure of their vessels and cargoes, by the Directory, a former form of government in France. The original price paid to France, through banking houses in Amsterdam and the "spoliation claims" above mentioned, brought the price of Louisiana up to $27,267,621.98, as officially stated. This treaty was signed April 30, 1803. Much opposition developed in the United States to the ratification of the treaty. The far-seeing statesmen of that day, alone, appreciated the vast importance of the territory thus cheaply purchased. Parts of New England, timorously plead against its confirmation, seeing all kinds of danger to the infant republic. Sober common sense, however, prevailed and the treaty was confirmed, and December following the province was officially delivered to the commissioners, Governor

Claiborne, of Mississippi, and General James Wilkinson, United States army.

Thus the United States became possessed of a territory extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and from the banks of the Mississippi river to the crests of the Rocky mountains. If the treaty, which was confirmed through the influence of President Jefferson, had miscarried, her dominion at that grand period would have been bounded on the west by the "Father of Waters," and the vast empire now a valuable part of the Great Republic, west of its waters, would have been in the possession of a foreign power. To that act of Livingston and Monroe in transcending their powers, which was only acquiesced in after it was done, was due the fact that North Dakota became a part of the United States.

At that time the territory, since known by the name of the Louisiana purchase, included what is now the states of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, parts of Wyoming and Colorado, and the territory of Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

On the first of October, 1803, by act of congress, all that part of the new country south of the thirty-third degree of north latitude, was set off and called the Territory of Orleans; this now forms part of the state of Louisiana. The balance of the new possessions, under the name of the District of Louisiana, was placed under the jurisdiction of a governor and a court known as that of the Indian Country. The name of this district was, July 1, 1805, changed to that of Territory, and the control given to a governor and three judges appointed by the president and confirmed by the senate of the United States.

By an act of congress, dated December 7, 1812, what is now North Dakota became a part of the Territory of Missouri and to the inhabitants of the new territory was granted a limited amount of local self-government.

Congress, on the twenty-eighth day of June, 1834, set off all that part of the so-called Louisiana purchase and lands otherwise acquired, lying east of the Missouri river and west of Lakes Huron and Erie, and north of what are now the states of Illinois and Missouri. This territory was called Michigan. It included what are now the sovereign states of North and South Dakota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota and Michigan. On the marking out of the boundaries of the latter upon admission as a state, July 3, 1836, the remaining part of the territory was called that of Wisconsin. By act of congress, July 12, 1838, on the admission of Wisconsin as a state, what are now the Dakotas became a part of the Territory of Iowa, and, in March, 1849, a portion of the Territory of Minnesota. All of that portion of the Dakotas lying west of the Missouri and White Earth rivers all this time was called the Mandan country, from a powerful tribe of Indians of that name who resided there. All of this latter portion was included in the newly organized territory of Nebraska, in 1854. On the 11th of May, 1858, Minnesota was admitted into the Union as a sovereign state and its boundaries fixed as now marked, leaving all that part of what is now known as North and South Dakota, lying between the western border of the new state and the Missouri and White Earth rivers, without official recognition, name or legal government, a sort of no man's land. The few settlers within its borders, not satisfied with this new state of affairs, proposed to exert themselves to obtain a form of territorial government and called their land the territory of Dakota. The history of that part of its history and the full account of its life as a territory can be found in the chapter in this volume under the head of Territorial Government.

CHAPTER III.

EXPLORING EXPEDITIONS IN NORTH DAKOTA AND VICINITY

Besides the numerous explorers and exploring expeditions mentioned in the former chapter there are others, prominent in the history of our country that more nearly and directly are connected with the farther northwest and North Dakota in particular. One of the most interesting and important, in a historical sense, of these was that of Verendrye. Here we find the first mention of the lands around the upper waters of the Missouri river and the aboriginal inhabitants of these lands. He and his party were the first white people to press the soil of the Dakotas, and theirs the first eyes to behold its beauties. On this account the story of their movements, their various discoveries and personal history is of interest, especially in connection with the history of the vigorous young state to whose annals this volume is devoted.

EXPEDITIONS OF VERENDRYE.

Verendrye, whose whole name was Pierre Gaultier Varennes Sieur de la Verendrye, was the son of Rene Gaultier Varennes, also Sieur de la Verendrye, for twenty-two years the chief magistrate at Trois Rivieres, Canada, and Marie Boucher, his wife, the latter the daughter of his predecessor. The younger Verendrye became a cadet in 1697, and in 1704 took part in a demonstration against New England. The following year he was in Newfoundland and in 1706 went to France, joining the regiment du Brittany. He was in the famous battle of Malplaquet, fought in 1709. He returned to Canada and became connected with the Lake Superior region. In 1728, while Verendrye was commander at the post on the shores of Lake Nipigon, in the north part of Lake Superior, he met, at Mackinaw, one Father De Honor, a Jesuit priest. This man had been with Guignas, who had, the September before, built Fort Beauharnois, on Lake Pepin. Part of the subject of the conversation of these two men, types of their times and country, was the connection by water between the lakes and the Pacific ocean. It was largely a matter of belief, at that period, that a channel of communication existed in that direction. An Indian by the name of Ochagach, or Otchaga, drew a rough map of the country beyond Lake Superior for Verendrye and which is still preserved among the archives of France. Various rivers are shown upon this map, the most interesting being, however, a mythical one called the river of the west. As most of the travel and nearly all the transportation of heavy material at that time was by water, this river would solve a weighty problem, and its discovery would add to the fame as well as the purse of the discoverer, for trading with the Indians was part of these expeditions. Father DeGonor conversed with Verendrye upon the subject of the river of the west and promised his influence with the governor general of New France, as Canada was then called, for fitting out an expedition to discover and explore it. Charles de Beauharnois, the governor general, gave Verendrye a respectful hearing and carefully examined the map of Ochagach, and was duly impressed with the value of the information. Soon orders were issued for the fitting out of an expedition for exploration, consisting of some fifty men. It left Montreal in the early summer of 1731, under the command of two sons of the Sieur de la Verendrye, and his nephew, De la Jemeraye, he being, as yet, detained by business engagements. He did not join the party until 1733.

In the autumn of 1731, the party reached Rainy Lake, by way of the Nantouagan, now Pigeon river. At that time this stream was known to the French as Groselliers river, after a noted explorer of this region.

Father Messayer, who had been located at a mission at the mouth of the Pigeon river, on Lake Superior, was taken along as spiritual director. At the foot of Rainy Lake a post was erected and called Fort St. Pierre. In 1732 the party crossed Lake Minittie, or Lake of the Woods, and established Fort St. Charles on its southwestern shore. On the Assinaboine river, about five leagues from Lake Winnipeg, they established another post. A map of these regions, made by De la Jemeraye, is still in the possession of the French government. The Winnipeg river was called by them Maurepas, after the famous minister of France, at that time in power. Their right to the possession of the river and surrounding country they protected by a fort of the same name.

Here their further advance was stopped for want of provisions and other supplies. But an arrangement was made, April 12, 1735, for a new equipment and another son of Verendrye joined the expedition. This was the fourth. In June, 1736, while twenty-one of the little force were camped upon an island in the Lake of the Woods, they were surprised by a band of Nadouessioux, or Sioux, and all killed. The island perpetuates this crime in its name of Massacre island. The bodies were found a few days after the event and buried. They were all dead and had been scalped. Father Ouneau, according to the journal of Verendrye, a missionary priest, who was with them, was found upon one knee, an arrow in his head, his breast bare, his left hand touching the ground and his right uplifted to the heavens, as if calling for protection upon his Maker. Among the slain, too, was one of the sons of Verendrye, their leader, who had been tomahawked. His father was at the foot of the same lake when he heard of the murder of his son, and about the same time received the news of the death of his nephew, Dufrost de la Jemeraye. The latter was a bold and enterprising man, and was a strong support to his uncle who missed him much in his subsequent wanderings. It was under the guidance of Jeremaye that the expedition had overcome the difficulties of the navigation of Pigeon river in the early days of their exploration. These were so great as to daunt anyone less energetic and strong-minded than he.

On the 3rd of October, 1738, they built a fort on the Assiniboine, which stream they called Charles river, after Charles Beauharnois, the governor general of New France. This advance post they called Fort La Reine or Queen's fort. A short distance from this point the river was joined by another, to which they gave the name of Pierre river after their leader. The latter fort became the center of trade and point of departure for all future exploring parties.

By their ascending the Assinaboine river to the mouth of the Souris or Mouse river, and then up the latter, these hardy explorers crossed what is now the international boundary line just west of Turtle mountains. Although this is not certain, the reading of the account justifying the writer in thinking it was further to the east. As it was, however, it was the first time that the foot of white men are known to have been planted upon the soil of what is now North Dakota; the first time civilized eyes had beheld its plains, its hills and its valleys. That is unless there is some truth in the story of Coronado, one of Cortez's lieutenants' visit to this far-off land when upon his long expedition to the north early in the sixteenth century, which is very doubtful. The first authentic expedition into North Dakota was under the command of Verendrye himself, and took place in 1741. It penetrated into the land of the Mantanes or Mandans, or whitebeards, a people who are said at that time to have had seven villages, with pine stockades, strengthened by a ditch, and were partially civilized. On the 29th of April, 1741, an expedition under the command of the two elder sons of Verendrye, left the Lake of the Woods and going westward followed in the tracks of the former expedition, arriving at the Missouri river and later at the Yellowstone. These rivers they passed safely and came in sight of the Rocky mountains January 1, 1743. On the 12th of the same month the chevalier, or second son of Verendrye, ascended the mountains for some distance; his brother being some distance behind and in charge of the train. On their homeward march, after visiting among the various tribes of the intervening country, trying to open up trade relations with them, the expedition reached their point of departure. On their way, on the upper Missouri, in what they call "the country of the Petite Cerise (little cherry) tribe," they planted, on an eminence, a leaden plate bearing the arms of France, and raised a monument of stones, which point they called Beautharnois. From there they returned to the Lake of the Woods. After some years of varied fortunes the Sieur de la Verendrye died, when just about to start on a new exploring expedition, December 6, 1749. He was singularly unfortunate, and notwithstanding his labors, and the toils and labors of his children, he died much poorer than when he embarked in the business of adding empire to the possessions of his king. He bore the main part of the expense of his expeditions himself, it being expected that he could recoup himself from trade with the Indians. None of the Dakota streams or towns bear his name in recognition of his great services nor commemorate the fact of his being the first European to tread its soil.

Probably others of these semi-military, semi-fur trading adventures may, possibly, have visited the northern part of North Dakota, in the succeeding years, but if so we have no account of them. The proximity of their trading posts around Lake Winnipeg and along the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan rivers certainly favors the supposition.

EXPEDITIONS OF DAVID THOMPSON.

The next, of moment, to visit this country was, in all probability, David Thompson, the surveyor, geographer and astronomer of the Northwest Company. He was an Englishman by birth, probably of humble parentage. He was, for seven years, a member of Christ Church Hospital school, in London. This was known as the Blue Coat School. In May, 1784, he was appointed a clerk to the Hudson's Bay Company, and was sent to Fort Churchill, then in charge of Samuel Herne, a native of London, England. After his term of service with the Hudson's Bay Company had expired Thompson entered the employ of the Northwest Company, and was commissioned to proceed to the Missouri river country and the headwaters of the Mississippi and make geographical and astronomical observations. After various work done in and about the Saskatchewan river, on the 28th of November, 1797, Thompson left McDonnell's post, in latitude forty-nine degrees, forty minutes, fifty-six seconds, on the Assiniboine river, for his journey to the Missouri. His little company was made up of seven French Canadian voyageurs, Rene Jussome, the interpreter, Hugh McCracken, an Irishman, and A. Brossman, a servant. Taking up the trail they, thirty-three days after, reached the Mandan villages on the Pekitanoni or Missouri river. Here Thompson and his party remained a short time, making observations and writing up his journal, surrounded by this partially semi-civilized tribe, who were advanced enough in the mechanic arts to make pottery; he made several short trips to the surrounding country. In returning, he says he went to Dog Tent hill, which bore north twenty-eight degrees east from the camp on the Missouri, and was distant fifty miles. From there to Turtle Hill, fourteen miles; thence to the Ash House, on the Souris or Mouse river, twenty-four miles, and thence to the McDonnell post, from which he started, north sixty-nine degrees east, forty-five miles. Thompson made another trip into the northern part of North Dakota in the following spring. He had started out on a surveying expedition on the 26th of February, 1798, with three Canadians and an Indian guide. They had with them three sleds drawn by dogs. The junction of the Mouse river with the Assiniboine was about half a mile from the McDonnell post, which was, as before, his point of departure. The snow was found quite deep, and the guide had to rest and be relieved every two or three hours. Following down the Assiniboine, on the 7th of March, the little party reached the junction of that stream with the Red river of the North, and began its survey. We are told in Mr. Thompson's journal, that, that day the sleds fell into the river, so, that about three o'clock in the afternoon, they were compelled to stop. The next day proved very tempestuous, snowing heavily, and it was very difficult to make any headway in traveling. The Indian guide became exhausted and Mr. Thompson, who seemed to be built of sterner stuff, took the lead. When night overtook him he was obliged to bivouac in the snow, the train being behind some miles. He passed the night, a very cold one, without shelter, in the open air. On Saturday, the 10th of March, it was clear, but cold, and about 8:30 A. M. the men with the train came up, and all that day was spent in drying their clothes and their goods.

The next morning, Sunday, the 11th, they started and walked by the compass to the tent poles of three lodges of Chippewas, of whom they were in search and who had passed a week before. Still pursuing the moving savages the trail was followed to the river, where it was lost in an immense snow drift. Shortly after noon the trail was recovered and the party set forth again. On Monday the Chippewas were found and two of them were prevailed upon to go with Mr. Thompson to the company's post on the Pembina river. Mr. Thompson says this river, which he calls the Summer Berry, derives its name from the red berries which so profusely line its banks, called by the Chippewas, Nepin, Summer, and Minan, berry. This the voyageurs and others had abbreviated to Pembina.

On the 14th of March he reached the post of the Northwest Company, at that time in charge of Charles Chaboullier, and there remained some six days recuperating after the exhausting journey through the snow, and waiting for more propitious weather. While at this place he took the necessary observations and found that the post was located in forty-eight degrees, fifty-four minutes, twenty-four seconds north latitude, ninety-seven degrees, sixteen minutes, forty seconds longitude west from Greenwich. This threw it south of the boundary of the British possessions. March 21st Mr. Thompson resumed his survey of the Red river, proceeding southward, and in latitude forty-seven degrees, fifty-four minutes, twenty-one seconds north latitude and longitude ninety-six degrees, nineteen minutes west, reached the trading post of Baptiste Cadotte, where he remained until the advent of spring and the breaking up of the ice in the river. This post was east of the river in what is now Minnesota. From there, April 9, he started to survey the headwaters of the Mississippi river. This terminated his connection with the annals of North Dakota. He afterwards became quite a noted explorer in the west and northwest and is spoken of by Franchere and by Washington Irving in their histories of the Astoria settlement as among the very earliest explorers of the upper waters of the Columbia river. The latter tells of his arrival at Astoria in July, 1811, in a canoe carrying the English flag. He says:

"On coming to the land, one of the crew stepped on shore and announced himself as David Thompson, astronomer, and partner of the Northwest Company. According to his account, he had set out in the preceding year with a tolerably strong party and a supply of Indian goods, to cross the Rocky mountains. A part of his people had, however, deserted him on the eastern side and returned with the goods to the nearest Northwest post. He had persisted in crossing the mountains with eight men who remained with him. They had traversed the higher regions, and ventured near the source of the Columbia, where, in the spring, they had constructed a cedar canoe, the same in which they had reached Astoria. * * * Mr. Thompson was, no doubt, the first white man who descended the northern branch of the Columbia from so near its source." He died in 1857 at the advanced age of eighty-nine.

EXPEDITION OF ALEXANDER HENRY.

Alexander Henry also was among the earliest visitors to Dakota. He was one of the partners of the Northwest Company and although of a limited education, his pen was that of a ready writer and his descriptions are graphic. From the unpublished journal of Mr. Henry some extracts may be of interest. After telling an interesting story of his adventures up to this time, he, under date of September 3, 1800, relates how he left half of the goods at the post he had established near the present site of Winnipeg, and started for the upper part of the Red river of the North. He was accompanied by Desmarrais, Bellagard, Roger, Benoit La Roque, Beauchman, Le France, Barbe, Charboneau, McDonnell and Parais. In his journal he writes under date of September 5, Friday:

"Early this morning I sent off the canoes, when Demarrais, and myself proceeded by land; we came to the Pambian (Pembina) river and crossed over to the old fort which was built in 1797-8 by M. Chaboullier, opposite the entrance of the Red river. On the east side of the Red river are the ruins of the old fort, built by Peter Grant some years ago, and which was the first establishment upon the Red river.

"September 6th.—At the Bois Perie, near where we are encamped, has been a great crossing for many years (he means wild game). The ground on both sides is beaten as hard as a pavement and the numerous roads leading to the river, a foot deep, are surprising, and when I consider the hard sod through which these tracks are beaten, I am entirely at a loss and bewildered in attempting to form any idea of the numerous herds of buffalo which must have passed here.

"Monday, 8th.—At 8 o'clock sent the canoes off, while Desmarrais and myself hurried off on horseback. We saw here the buffalo, all in motion, crossing from the east to the west side, directing their course to the Hair hills. We chased several herds, and had fine sport, but only killed two fat cows, and took a small load down to the river, for the canoes to take in as they passed. Here I lost one of my spurs. Having brought the meat near the river, we set out and did not stop until we reached the Park river, at 2 o'clock. We tied our horses at the entrance of the little river, and went out to search for a proper spot to build, as the Indians would not ascend the Red river any higher. My men, also, began to murmur very much, and even Desmarrais, who is an old veteran, one of the first who ever came up this river. We went up the river about a mile and attempted to drink, but found the water a perfect brine. I now find it impossible to build here, even if the wood had been more proper.

"Tuesday, 9th.—Early this morning I went out in search of a proper place to build. I found none so well situated for defense, and wood at hand, as a point of woods on the west side of the Red river within a quarter of a mile of the little (Park) river, a beautiful level plain which divides us from that river."

Under a later date Mr. Henry says:

"January 17, 1801.—We had a terrible snow storm. I can now daily count from the top of my oak tree from twenty to thirty herds of buffalo feeding out on the plains. It is surprising how the cow buffalo resist the cold, piercing north winds, which at times blow with such violence over these bleak plains, which cause such a drift that it is impossible to face it for any time. Still the animals will stand grazing in the open field. * * *

"April 1st, Wednesday.—The river clear of ice, but the drowned buffalo continue to drift down by entire herds. Several of them were lodged upon the bank near the fort. The Indian women have cut up some of the fattest for their own use. The flesh appears to be fresh and good. It really is astonishing what vast quantities must have perished, as they form one continual line in the middle of the river for two days and two nights."

On the 4th of May Mr. Henry started north with the result of the winter's hunt. He sent off, that day, three canoes with forty-five packs of ninety pounds each. On the 15th he planted a garden on the north side of the Pembina river, where he established a new post, at a point between the stream and the Red river. This seems to be the first account we have of any white person trying to cultivate the soil of the Red river valley. He slept that night in the old fort on the south side. On the 29th he left the post in charge of M. Langlois and proceeded to Grand Portage on Lake Superior. He did not return until September.

In his journal, under date of October 3, 1802, Mr. Henry writes the following description of the first Red river cart train:

"M. Langlois started for Hair Hills. This caravan demands notice to exhibit the vast difference it makes in a place where horses are introduced. It is true they are useful animals, but, if we had but one in the northwest we should have less, laziness for men would not be burdened with families, and so much given to indolence and insolence. * * * But let us now take a view of the bustle and noise which attends the present transportation of five pieces of goods. The men were up at the break of day, and their horses tackled long before sunrise, but they were not in readiness to move before ten o'clock, when I had the curiosity to climb up to the top of my house to examine the movements and observe the order of march. Anthony Payet, guide and second in command, leads off with a cart drawn by two horses, and loaded with his own private baggage, bags and kettles. Madame Payet follows the cart with a child one year old on her back, and very merry. C. Bottineau, with two horses and a cart loaded with one and a half packs, his own baggage, two young children with kettles and other trash hanging to his cart. Madam Bottineau, with a young squalling child on her back, which she is scolding and tossing about.

"Joseph Dubord goes on foot, with his long pipestem and calumet in his hand. Madam Dubord follows her husband carrying his tobacco pouch.

"Anthony Thelliere, with a cart and two horses loaded with one and a half packs of goods and Dubord's baggage.

"Anthony LoPoint, with another cart and two horses loaded with two pieces of goods and baggage belonging to Brisbois, jessemin and Poulliotte, and a kettle suspended on each side. Jessemin goes next to Brisbois with gun, and pipe in mouth, puffing out clouds of smoke. Mr. Poulliotte, the greatest smoker in the northwest, has nothing but pipes and pouch. These three fellows, having taken the farewell dram and lighting fresh pipes, go on, brisk and merry, playing numerous pranks. Dom Livermore, with a young mare, the property of M. Langlois, loaded with weeds for smoking, and an Indian bag, Madame's property, and some squashes and potatoes, and a keg of fresh water and two young whelps.

"Next comes the young horse of Livermore, drawing a traville with his baggage, and a large worsted mashqueucate belonging to Madame Langlois. Next appears Madame Cameron's young mare, kicking and roaring, hauling a traville which was loaded with a bag of flour and some cabbage, turnips, onions, a small keg of water and a large bottle of broth. M. Langlois, who is master of the band, now comes, leading a horse that draws a traville nicely and covered with a new painted tent, under which is lying his daughter and Mrs. Gameron, extended full length and very sick. This covering or canopy has a very pretty effect. Madam Langlois now brings up the rear; following the traville with a slow step and melancholy air, attending to the wants of her daughter. The rear guard consisted of a long train of dogs, twenty in number. The whole forms a string nearly a mile long and appears like a large band of Assiniboines."

In July, 1806, Alexander Henry and his brother William, in company with two men and a horse, left Pembina for the Missouri river. At Lake Platz they found a Mr. Darwin located. Shortly after this the party reached the Mandan villages. Mr. Henry's description of these people should be published as it gives a graphic account of the mode of life at that date of these curious people, now almost exterminated. He, from there, went further west and visited the Gros Ventre tribes, after which he returned to Pembina.

LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION.

About the time of the consummation of the Louisiana purchase, Thomas Jefferson, then president of the United States, determined to thoroughly explore the northwestern part of the newly-acquired territory, of which nothing at that time was known, with the purpose of ascertaining its resources and value. Accordingly, by direction of General H. Dearborn, at that time secretary of war, a party of men were ordered to rendezvous at the mouth of the Wood river, in Illinois, for that purpose. Captain Merriwether Lewis, of the First United States Infantry, and Captain William Clark, a brother of the famous Revolutionary General George Rogers Clark, were selected by the department to lead the expedition. This consisted of some forty-three persons altogether, soldiers, boatmen, guides, hunters and interpreters. May 14, 1804, the party embarked in two pirogues and one bateau and proceeded on their long voyage up the Missouri river, whose turbid tide rolls down from the high Rockies. About twenty miles above the present site of the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, the expedition made a halt, and there held a palaver or council with the Indians. This was on the Nebraska side of the river, and the place was called in the journal of the party, Council Bluffs, from which the Iowa city drew its name. On the 18th of August, the same year, after having accomplished nearly a thousand miles of their journey and having had many strange adventures, the expedition landed on the Nebraska side of the river, nearly opposite what is now the southwest corner of Woodbury county, Iowa, and went into camp. Here they held another council and entered into a treaty with a party of Otoe and Missouri Indians. On the morning of the 20th the savages mounted their horses and left after receiving some presents. The day before this Sergeant Charles Floyd, one of the little party, became very sick and remained so all night. The next morning, which was Monday, August 20, the expedition set out on its journey up the river. Having to use their own words, "a fine wind and fine weather," they made some thirteen miles, and at two o'clock landed upon the Iowa side of the river, for dinner. Here Sergeant

Floyd died. About a mile further up the river, on the summit of a high bluff, his body was buried, with all the honors, by his comrades. This was the first death among the party. A short distance above Sergeant's Bluff, as the place of burial is now called, a small river, now within the limits of Sioux City, Clark gave the name of Floyd river. The next day they resumed their progress. On the 21st of August they passed the mouth of the Big Sioux, and, a few days later, the mouth of the James river (called in their journal Jacques river), where they found bluffs that contained "a great quantity of mineral, cobalt, cinnabar, alum, copperas and several other things." On the 19th and 20th of September they passed the Grand Bend in the Missouri, as they named it, now in South Dakota between Hughes and Buffalo counties. They reckoned the distance around it as equal to thirty miles, while across the narrow neck of land it was less than a mile. October 7 they passed the mouth of the Moreau river, which was known as the Cerwer-cer-na, which they found to be some two hundred and seventy feet wide at its mouth, with a deep, clear channel. Here they found a camp of Arickarees. The mouth of the Grand river was passed by them on the 8th of the same month. This was known to them as the Marapa, for it seemed from their journal that all these streams had names, either in Indian, French or English, showing that others had been before them. About this region they encountered several bands and villages of Arickarees, with whom they made a treaty and from whom they purchased vegetables, such as squashes, beans and corn. About the 12th of October the expedition passed what is now the southern boundary line of North Dakota, and on the 18th, after many vexatious delays and some accidents, owing to easterly winds and some sand bars, they reached the mouth of the Cannon Ball river. Snow fell on the 21st of October when they were near the present site of Bismarck. Game, especially buffalo and antelope, were plentiful and considerable hunting was done by the party. The river now known as the Little Heart, they knew as the Chisheet. On the 24th, when they were, according to their reckoning, about 1,610 miles above the mouth of the Missouri river, they encountered the first Mandan Indians they had seen. On the 27th they reached some of their villages and, two days later, held a council with them, at which were present some Sioux and a member of Minneteer or Gros Ventre tribe. Winter now was approaching. The weather was growing cold, and severe temperature being likely to soon overtake them, the leaders of the expedition began to look around them for a suitable spot for the erection of winter quarters. On the first of November such a spot was found on an extensive bottom covered with a vigorous growth of cottonwood trees. Here they built a strong stockade and constructed substantial cabins in which to pass the winter season. A close search of the journal of the expedition, and of the memoirs of Patrick Gass, one of its members, fails to disclose the exact spot of this encampment, so that it can not be accurately located at the present. From the latitude, which is given as forty-seven degrees, twenty-one minutes, twenty-three seconds north and longitude one hundred and one degrees, twenty-five minutes west of Greenwich, the quarters, to which they gave the name of Fort Mandan, would place it on the west bank of the Missouri, but a few miles below the mouth of the Big Knife river. It has been suggested that the site of this place was the site afterwards occupied by old Fort Clark, built in 1809. The claim is also made, probably with a good show of probability, that it stood on what is now section 14, township 144 north, range 82, west of the sixth principal meridian. This would place it upon the other or left bank of the river near where Washburn, McLean county, is now situated. The distance from this point to the mouth of the Big Knife river is about twenty-five miles. About the 7th or 8th of December an immense herd of buffalo invaded the bottom around the fort and whites and Indians indulged in a general slaughter of the beasts, both for provender, and for the valuable hides. On the 10th the spirit in the thermometer froze when exposed to the open air; but the men did not suffer materially, being able to go about readily. This was due to the healthful, dry, cold atmosphere. Christmas and New Years were celebrated at the fort by high festivities. Of the weather observed by these pioneers in this new country we are told that no rain fell between November and January 21; that the temperature was alternately cold and moderate, and that they had occasional snow storms. The men employed their time throughout the winter in constructing four dugouts or canoes, which they had completed by March 1, and two more shortly after.

On the 7th of April, 1805, the expedition, having made all preparations, broke up their winter quarters and entering their two pirogues and six canoes, started anew on their long journey into the unknown land. The batteau was sent back to St. Louis loaded with furs, peltry and curiosities. On the 12th of the same month they reached the mouth of the Little Missouri river. Here it is mentioned by Mr. Gass, in his annals of the trip, that they found specimens of petrified wood, so perfectly marked that they could determine the species of trees, some being oak, others ash or cottonwood. Some of the men carried off pieces for whetstones. Diligently pursuing their way, day by day, the party reached the mouth of the Yellowstone river and made measurements of that stream which proved to be the larger one of the two streams. The expedition passed on up the Missouri through the mountains and then followed the Columbia river to its confluence with the waters of the mighty Pacific. The two main branches of the Columbia, for many years, bore the names of Clark and Lewis, respectively. On their return trip the expedition reached the mouth of the Yellowstone August 7, 1806, from whence they moved onward to St. Louis, traversing the Dakotas with but little incident.

THE ASTOR OR HUNT EXPEDITION.

Early in the century John Jacob Astor, wealthy merchant of New York, who had come from his native land, Germany, a boy, and who had grown rich in the fur trade, formed what is known as the Pacific Fur Company. After some difficulty, an extensive establishment, for the center of trade with the Indians and as a store for the sale of such goods as the trappers and hunters would buy, was opened at the mouth of the Columbia river, in what is now the young state of Washington. On the shores of the estuary, connected with the waters of the Pacific, it was possible to transport much of the heavy material and goods by sea. Accordingly an expedition was fitted out to go round the Horn, the vessel carrying it being the good ship Tonquin. It was determined, at the same time, to send another party across the continent for the purpose of exploring the country and seeking out proper sites for trading posts, as well as to make arrangements for trade with the Indians. This latter was to follow partially in the path of the Lewis and Clark expedition, viz: up the Missouri river. With the misfortunes of the expedition by ocean this history has nothing to do.

Of the land party it is recorded that after considerable expense and trouble, Wilson Price Hunt, one of the principal partners in the company, gathered together a mixed body of men, some Canadian voyageurs, some Indian traders, some wild adventurous spirits who only cared for the excitement of the trip, and with this following pushed out into the wilderness. He left Mackinaw, where he had done the most of his recruiting, August 12, 1810, took the usual route by Green Bay, Fox and Wisconsin rivers to Prairie du Chien and thence down the Mississippi to St. Louis, where the party landed September 3rd. At that place the little party was enlarged by the addition of some hunters and boatmen of a more sturdy, reliable type than the French Canadians, of whom the greater part of the force was made up. October 20th the expedition pushed out on its journey into the known and unknown dangers that were before them, and by the 16th of November they had reached a point at the mouth of the Nodaway river about four hundred and fifty miles above St. Louis. Here they remained all winter. In the spring, being recruited, they proceeded in their forward movement. On the 12th of June the party reached a village of the Arickaree Indians, which was within the bounds of what is now North Dakota, being between the forty-sixth and forty-seventh degrees of north latitude, and on the banks of the Missouri river. This village, to quote the words of Washington Irving, "was divided into two portions about eighty yards apart, being inhabited by two distinct bands. The whole extended about three-quarters of a mile along the river bank, and was composed of conical lodges, that looked like so many little hillocks, being wooden frames intertwined with osier, and covered with earth. The plain beyond the village swept up into hills of considerable height, but the whole country was nearly destitute of trees. While they were regarding the village they beheld a singular fleet coming down the river. It consisted of a number of canoes, each made of a single buffalo hide stretched on sticks, so as to form a kind of circular trough. Each one was navigated by a single squaw, who knelt on the bottom and paddled, towing after her frail bark a bundle of floating wood intended for firing." At this village the expedition remained a short time and traded with the Indians. They procured horses here of the Arickarees and departed at first northwest, but soon turned southwest to avoid the country of the Blackfeet. On the 23d of July they reached what they called the banks of the Big river. Here they rested again but soon passed on into what is now probably South Dakota, and thus their connection with the future state of North Dakota ceased. The full history of this unfortunate expedition and their fruitless efforts toward upbuilding a rival fur company in opposition to the others already in existence, is given at length in Washington Irving's "Astoria."

MAJOR STEPHEN H. LONG'S EXPEDITION.

The interesting information brought back by the expedition under Clarke and Lewis, relating to the tributaries of the Missouri river, the adjacent lands and of the Rocky mountains, and also that of Governor Lewis Cass through the northeastern part of Minnesota, induced the government of the United States to send out another expedition for the purpose of exploring the valley of the Minnesota river and the country along the Red river of the North.

Major Stephen H. Long was in command of this party, which started in the summer of 1823. Attached to the force were Thomas Say, zoologist and antiquarian; William H. Keating, mineralogist, geologist and historian; and Samuel Seymour, landscape painter and designer. Late at night, on the 2nd of July, they reached Mendota, opposite Fort Snelling, Minnesota. After a cordial reception by the garrison and the officers at that post, on the afternoon of the 9th of July they commenced the exploration of the valley of the Minnesota river. Joseph Renville, a Bois Brule, or half breed, after whom one of the counties of Minnesota is named, Joseph Snelling, son of the commandant of the fort, and Beltrami, an Italian refugee, were joined to the expedition at this point. To ensure a more accurate survey of the region part of the force proceeded by land, while the other portion embarked in canoes and moved by the water route. On the 14th both detachments joined and all proceeded together by land, on the south side of the river. On the 22nd they reached Big Stone Lake, which is considered the head of the Minnesota river. They followed the bed of a dried up stream for three miles, and found themselves on Lake Traverse. This latter body of water is the head of the Red river of the North, and the expedition was impressed with the idea that thus in sight lay the sources of two considerable rivers, one of which emptied, through the Mississippi, into the Gulf of Mexico, and the other, through Lake Winnipeg, into Hudson's Bay. Here, for the first time, the expedition fell in with a party of Dacotah or Sioux Indians, who visited them. Major Long and party visited one of the fur trading posts then under the superintendence of a Mr. Mooers. The traders of the Columbia Fur Company at Lake Traverse received the party with a salute and exhibited the most hospitable disposition. On the morning of the 5th of August, after following the crooked course of the Red river, the expedition reached Pembina, and were kindly received by Mr. Nolen, then in charge. At this point Major Long's party remained several days, spending four of them in determining the international boundary line. A flag staff was planted, which, by a series of observations, was found to stand at a point in latitude forty-eight degrees, fifty-nine minutes and fifty-seven and one-third seconds north. The distance to the boundary line was measured off and an oak post fixed on it, bearing on the north side the letters G. B. for Great Britain, and on the south U. S. for the United States. On the 8th of August the United States flag was hoisted on the staff, the national salute was fired and due proclamation made that all the territory in the Red river valley south of that was part of the United States of America.

There were other expeditions to this part of the country, but these are believed to be the earliest and most important.

Shortly after the return of the Lewis and Clark expedition, the government determined to control the country and the fur traders and Indian tribes dwelling therein. With this end in view, and from year to year as circumstances seemed to demand it, forts were erected at various points, chiefly along the Missouri. The principal of these, some of which are still standing, and in full commission, were forts Clark, Stevenson, Berthold, Buford, Abraham Lincoln, old Fort Rice, Forts Rice, Totten, Abercrombie and Ransom. At most of these troops were kept as a protection and to preserve order. Some were abandoned, but many of them are still in useful state and until late years held full garrisons. Those of them in full commission at this time of writing have enough men present to take care of them and protect the rights and property of the government therein.

CHAPTER IV.

INDIANS; INDIAN HISTORY AND TRADITIONS.

The dark veil that hangs over the history of the American continent prior to the advent of the white man is impenetrable. Although science has fully demonstrated the fact that this is the elder of the continents in point of upheaval from the general mass, as shown by the "grand epic writ by the hand of the Eternal upon the everlasting rocks," the annals of its earlier inhabitants are covered, perhaps forever, by the dust of oblivion. Remains found scattered up and down throughout this broad land, speak of a people far advanced in civilization; ruins that vie in magnitude and symmetry with those of ancient Assyria and "hundred gated Thebes." Conjecture runs rife as to who these people were, what time did they come here and from whence; but no evidence is left upon which to build the story of the vanished race or races. Theories have been advanced by ripe scholars to account for their presence. Some, like Prescott, have imagined a connection between them and the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel, and others to the descendant of Modoc, the Welsh prince, who tradition avers came to these shores in a very early day. But the case is hopeless; their records, if they had any, are dust, and save for the crumbling ruins of their former cities and their other vast works, they are as if they never existed.

When the European first touched our shores, with the exception of the barbaric semi-civilization of Anahuac, now Mexico, or of Peru, they found the land in the hands of a wild, nomadic race of untutored savages. To these the early explorers and discoverers, always imagining that they had landed upon the shores of China and the Indies, gave the name of Indians. Along the Atlantic coast were found tribes, often hostile to one another, but all the representatives of the great Algonquin race. Further inland lived other great families, like the Iroquois, but all with the same general characteristics. The wars and migrations of these wild tribes would form an interesting chapter in the early history of our country, were space sufficient to enter upon its relation. But the story has been told elsewhere, and this work was conceived with the better idea of presenting, in detail, the annals of the settlement and development of the white people upon this part of the great Republic.

When the pious missionaries of the Church of Rome and the enterprising fur trader of European birth first pushed their way, with incredible toil, into the forests and prairies of the great northwest, they found, in what is now the states of Minnesota and the Dakotas, a race of red men, now known by the general name of Sioux.

These savages are of an entirely different group from those found throughout New England and along the banks of the Mohawk and Susquehanna. Although they have many customs in common with the tribes that once dwelt to the east of them, yet their language and many peculiarities mark them as belonging to a distinct race. When they were first noticed by the European adventurers, large numbers were found about the head of Lake Superior and on throughout the lake region of what is now Minnesota and Manitoba. The name by which they call themselves, Dacotah, signifies allied or leagued. The name Sioux, often written Sioux or Soos, by which they are better known, was given them by early travelers in that country. For centuries there had raged a relentless war between the Dacotah and the Ojibways, or Chippewas, and these latter always designated their opponents by the name of Nadowessieux or Nadowaysieux, signifying enemies. The historian, Charlevoix, who visited the northwest in 1721, in his Annals of New France, says: "The name of Sioux, that we give these Indians, is entirely of our own making, or rather it is the last two syllables of the name Nadouessieux, as many nations call them." There has been suggested by a local writer, who had excellent opportunities to learn of such matters, that the name Dacotah, instead of meaning allied, has an entirely different derivation, and one so plausible that its insertion here may not be out of place. It is as follows: The Sioux Indian, like so many of his red brethren, has for centuries been in contact with the missionaries, many of whom were French priests, and has been associated with the Canadian voyageurs and has learned to like and speak the French language, and they take pride in speaking the "priest language," as they call it. When the Anglo-Saxon first came among these people, on his asking what tribe did he, the Indian, belong to, and where did he live, the Dakotah, probably with wide-sweeping gesture so common to the race, answered shortly, Sioux du Coteau, meaning Sioux of the Hills. His total ignorance of the French tongue, and his having no idea of its use by a savage, led the uneducated American or Englishman to conclude that it was an Indian name, and it was accordingly handed down in its present form of Dacotah.

The Dacotah was an allied race, however, they often giving themselves the name of Ocetisakowin, or the Seven Council Fires. The principal members of this league were seven tribes or sub-divisions, many of whom had their home in what is now Minnesota in an early day, but who, driven back by the advancing whites, took up their residence in Dakota. Some of them, however, were found dwellers on the broad plains of the Dakotas, and had been for a long time previous to the advent of the white man.

The principal sub-nations, or tribes, who made up the league, and who held annual councils for the general good, were as follows:

The M'dewakantonwans, or those who live in the village of the Spirit Lake, evidently Mille Lac, in Minnesota, where they formerly had their residence.

The Wahpekutewans, or villages of the leaf shooters, a name of uncertain derivation, but probably from the shape of their stone arrow heads, which were broader and more leaf-like in shape than the others.

The Wahpetonwans, or villages in the leaves or woods, pointing to their abode being in the forests of Minnesota about the Little Rapids of the Minnesota river. From there they were removed finally to the reservation about Big Stone lake.

The Sissitonwans, meaning villages of the marsh, a people who lived at one time on the west bank of the Mississippi river. All these four sub-tribes went, also, by the general name of Isanyati or Isantees. This name is identical with the Issati of Hennepin. The name grew out of the fact that they once lived on or near Isantandi or Knife lake, one of the Mille Lacs. It is asserted that the lake drew its name from the stone on its banks, which the primitive Indians sought to make into knives (isan).

The other tribes in the league were the Minnekanye Wogopuwans, or the villages of those that plant by the water. The Ihankwannas, the band of the end village, a people whose name, corrupted by the white people into Yanktonnias or Yanktons, gave its title to the city which was the capital of the Territory for many years, Yankton. This tribe dwelt in the country between the Red river and the Missouri, and were its sole masters for some time. It was sub-divided into several sub-tribes: Hunkpatidans; Pabaksa, or Cut Heads; Wazikutes, or Pine Shooters, and Kiyuksa, those who divide or break the law. According to the Indian traditions, the Hohays, or Assinboine of the country just north of Dakota, were a part of this branch.

Tetonwans, who were the undisputed masters of the land west of the Missouri river, to the Rocky mountains. These, also, were closely allied with the Cheyennes and Arickarees, with whom they formed many marriage alliances. Among the divisions of this powerful branch of the Dacotah nations were the Sicaou or Burnt Thighs, called usually the Brule Sioux, after Father Brule, a French priest; Itazipeho, or Sans Arc, without bows; the Sihasaps, feet that are black; the Oehenonpa, two kettles or boilers; Ogallals, wanderers in the mountains; Minne-coupoux, those who plant by the water; and the Onkpapas, they that dwell by themselves.

These people were, evidently, banded together at a very early day, for, in the history of the mission at La Pointe, on Lake Superior, one of the Fathers, in writing of the Dacotahs, says: "For sixty leagues from the extremity of the Upper Lake, toward sunset; and, as it were, in the center of the western nations, they have all united their force by a general league." This was penned almost two and a half centuries ago.

LeSueur, an early explorer in the Sioux country, in the year 1700, says that, according to the Eastern Sioux, or Scioux as he spells it, the Sioux of the West, namely, those west of the Mississippi, had, at that time, more than a thousand lodges. He goes on to say that they do not use canoes, nor cultivate the earth, or gather wild rice. They remain generally in the prairies which are between the upper Mississippi and the Missouri rivers, and live entirely by the chase. They say, generally, that they have three souls, and that after death the soul that has done well goes to the warm country, that which has done evil to the cold, and the third guards the body.

Polygamy is common among them. They are very jealous, and sometimes fight in duel for their wives. They manage the bow admirably and have been seen several times to kill ducks on the wing. They make their lodges of a number of buffalo skins, interlaced and sewed, and carry them wherever they go. They are all great smokers.

This description of the savage of long ago, which is much abridged from the original, is a good picture of the Dacotah at the present.

The subject of the claim for precedence or superiority among the different bands of the Sioux is often discussed. The M'dewakantonwans thought that the mouth of the Minnesota river was just over the center of the earth, and they, therefore, should have special consideration, as they did occupy the gate that opens into the western world. The tribes of the Sissitonwans and Ihanktonwans alleged that as they lived on the great water-shed of this part of the continent, from which the streams ran north, east, south and west, they must have been about the center of the earth, and they urge this fact as entitling them to precedence. It is singular that the Tetonwans, who were much the largest band of the Dakotas, did not appear to claim the chief place for themselves, but yielded to the pretensions of the Ihanktonwans, whom they called by the name of Wiciyela, which in its meaning may be regarded as about equivalent to "They are the people."

From a work called Dakota Dictionary, published by the United States government in 1853, under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institute, a book written by Rev. S. A. Riggs, a worthy man who labored for years as a missionary among the Sioux, has been gathered a few facts. Mr. Riggs says, in speaking of the Dacotah tongue:

"In the language as spoken by the different bands of those properly denominated Dakotas, some differences exist. The intercourse between the Indewakantonwans of the Mississippi and lower Minnesota, and the Wahpetonwans, Wahpekutes and a part of the Sissitonwans family has been so constant that but slight variations are discoverable in their manner of speaking. In some instances where the Wahpetonwans use d, some of the Indewakantonwans so modify the sound that it becomes t, and where the former use h, the latter sometimes employ n. As a matter of course, some few words have currency in one band which are not used, perhaps, not generally known to the others; but none of the dialectical variations are of such a kind as to impede the free intercourse of thought.

"The Sissitonwans of Lake Traverse and the prairie present more differences in their speech. One of the most marked of these is their use of na for dan, the diminutive termination. As there is less frequent intercourse between them and the Isanties, their provincialisms are more numerous; and from their connections with the Ihanktonwans of the prairie they have adopted some of their forms of speech.

"The chief peculiarity of the Ihanktonwan dialect, as compared with that of the Dakotas of the Minnesota valley, is the almost universal substitution of k for h. The Tetonwan dialect exhibits more striking differences. In it the g, hard, is used for the h of the Isanties and k of the Ihanktonwans, and rejecting d altogether, they use l in its stead.

"By the bands of Dakotas east of the James river, hard g is not heard except as a final in some syllables where contraction has taken place and l does not occur. Thus, to illustrate the foregoing, Canpahinihona, a cart or wagon, of the Wahpetonwans, becomes cupnunminera in the mouth of an Indewakautonwan, canpakmekma in that of an Ihanktonwan, and canpazmigma with a Tetonwan. Hda, to go home, of the Isanties, is kda in the Ihanktonwan dialect, and gla in the Tetonwan. Many words, too, are entirely different, as for example, isan, a knife. The Tetonwans say milla, and the Ihanktonwans, minna.

Isantanka, the name by which the people of the United States are designated on the Mississippi and Minnesota, becomes Minnahanka or Millahanka, on the Missouri. In the arrangement of words in a sentence, the Dakota language may be regarded as eminently primeval and natural. The sentence, give me bread, a Dakota transposes to agnyapi-makee-ye, bread me give. Such is the genius of the language that in translating a sentence or verse from the Bible, it is generally necessary to commence, not at the beginning, but at the end; and such, too, is the common practice of their best interpreters. When the person who is speaking leaves off, there they commence and proceed backward to the beginning. In this way the connection of the sentence is more easily retained in the mind, and more naturally evolved. There are, however, some cases in which this method can not be followed. In a logical argument, if the conclusion is first translated, it will in some cases need to be repeated after the premises, but the therefore which connects the conclusions to the premises, very frequently in Mr. Renville's translations, comes after the conclusion."

Mr. Riggs further says that the Dakotas have a sacred language known only to their war prophets, conjurers and medicine men. It is unintelligible to the common people, who imagine that those who use it are a very superior class of beings. It is not a very extensive vocabulary, the mixture of a few strange words with mispronounced common words, answers for the effect. Like the school boy's "hog latin," it is good only among the unsophisticated and unlearned.

Although the Dakotah has but little idea of poetry or song, he has a species of dismal chant, which he calls singing. A few words make a long song, for the interjection hi-hi-hi, often repeated, is only now and then broken in upon by intelligible words. They have what are war songs. They are highly figurative, ambiguous in meaning, and it is doubtful as to their being understood even by those who inflict them upon the ear.

The religion of the Sioux is exceedingly indistinct, and they are quite reluctant to converse about it. They are decidedly polytheistic in their belief. The hunter roaming over the plain finds a granite boulder; he stops and prays to it, for it is Waukawn, or mystery. At another time he will pray to his dog, or to the sun, moon or stars. In every leaf, in every stone, in every shrub he sees a god, he finds a spirit. He is the same in this as the Indians of the coast of whom Cotton Mather once wrote, in his life of the preacher Eliot: "All the religion they have amounts to this much: they believe that there are many gods, who made and own the several nations of the earth. They believe that every remarkable creature has a peculiar god within or about him; there is with them a sun god or a moon god or the like; and they cannot conceive but that the fire must be a kind of god, inasmuch as a spark of it will soon produce very strange effects. They believe that when any good or ill happens to them, there is the favor or anger of a god expressed in it."

It is said that among the traditions of the Dakotah tribes are many that are readily recognized by the student of the United States history as real events of the Revolutionary war. The remnants of the warlike tribes of the native Indians of New England and the middle states, who fled westward before the advancing tide of civilization, crossed the Mississippi and found refuge on the soil of the Isantee. Here was told the story of their wrongs. Around the campfires of the Sioux were related their tale of wrong and outrage, of the murder of their people and the robbery of their lands by the cruel white men. These refugees intermarried with the Sioux. The desire for vengeance rankled in the breasts of their descendants and found its last expression in the massacre in Minnesota in 1862.

"The government of these ancient people seems to have been a republic similar to that of the United States. The Oeti Sakowin made laws for the whole nation, defined the boundary lines of each settled division, and inter-tribal difficulties dealing only with national questions and those affecting the general welfare of the whole people, thus corresponding to our national congress. Each division was divided into several tribes, each having a separate chief and local council who regulated the affairs of each tribe. These held an annual council to make laws and settle difficulties between the various tribes, and decide disputes as to hunting and fishing privileges.

"This council corresponded to our state governments. Each tribe was subdivided into a number of bands or families each, under its head chief, and having its own prophet. The government of these bands was patriarchal and the offices of chief and prophet were hereditary.

"In the state and national councils the chief officer was elective, but was usually held for life, as the incumbent was nearly always re-elected.

"As time passed on and the white men encroached upon their lands from the east, the divisions on the east were forced westward and into the lands of the other divisions. Previous to this time they had not trespassed upon each other's lands, and their migrations were from north to south and return, according to the seasons, for fur, fish, game and wild fruits, each division traversing its own land, and they never journeyed east or west except on their own division of country. The refugees of the other divisions did not always receive a warm welcome from their brothers of the other divisions. When the Sissetonwans were driven out of Minnesota in 1862 they sought refuge with the Tetonwans. But dissensions in regard to their hunting grounds arose, and the Tetonwans attacked and nearly decimated the Sissetonwans, who were driven back east of the Missouri and to the lands of the Wahpetonwans, where a remnant of this once powerful division still exists under the name of the Sisseton Sioux."

The Sioux counts years by winters, and computes distance by the number of sleeps or nights passed upon a journey. Their months are computed by moons, and bear the following names: Witeri, January, the hard moon; Wicatowi, February, the raccoon moon; Istawicayazanwi, March, the sore eye moon; Magaokadiwi, April, moon when geese lay eggs, sometimes called Wokadiwi, and also Watopapiwi, or the moon when the streams are navigable; Wojupiwi, May, planting moon; Wajustecasawi, June, the moon when strawberries are red; Canpasapawi and Wasupawi, July, moon when choke cherries are ripe and moon when geese shed their feathers; Wasutonwi, August, harvest moon; P'sihnaketuwi, September, the moon when rice is laid up to dry; Wiwajupi, October, drying rice moon; Takiyurawi, November, deer rutting month; and Tahecapsunwi, December, the moon when the deer sheds his horns.

The legends of the Dakotahs are numerous. While some are puerile, a few are beautiful. One of them tells of Eagle Eye, the son of a great war prophet, who lived more than a hundred years ago, and who was distinguished for bravery. Fleet, athletic, symmetrical, a bitter foe and a warm friend, he was a model Dakotah. In the ardor of his youth his affections were given to one who was, also, attractive, whose name was Scarlet Dove. A few moons after she had become an inmate of his lodge, they descended the Mississippi with a hunting party and proceeded east of Lake Pepin. One day while Eagle Eye lay hidden behind some shrubbery, waiting for a deer, a comrade's arrow pierced the leafy covert and struck him to the heart. With only time to lisp the loved name, Scarlet Dove, he expired.

For a few days the widow mourned and gashed her flesh, as was the custom upon such occasions, then, with the silence of woe, wrapped her beloved in skins and placed him on a temporary scaffold. The Sioux do not bury their dead, but place them on a scaffold above the earth or in the tree tops. Underneath the resting place of Eagle Eye sat Scarlet Dove until the party was ready to return to their own place. Then, taking down all that was left of the husband of her heart, she patiently carried it back to their home. On her shoulders she carried her burden, and each night when the party camped she built a temporary resting place above the earth for his beloved remains. When she reached the Minnesota river, a hundred miles from where he lost his life, the patient woman rested. Going into the forest, she brought poles forked and poles straight, and forthwith she built a permanent burial scaffold on a beautiful hill, opposite Fort Snelling. Having placed the body upon this elevation, according to the customs of her race, with the strap with which she had carried her precious burden hanged herself to the scaffold and died.

Another legend tells how that, previous to the creation of man, the great spirit, Onaktayhee, used to slay the buffalo and eat them on the ledge of the red rocks on the top of the Coteau des Prairies, and their blood, running on the rocks, turned them

red. One day when a large snake had crawled into the nest of the bird to eat his eggs, one of the eggs hatched out in a clap of thunder, and the Great Spirit, catching hold of a piece of the pipe-stone to throw it at the snake, moulded it into a man. This man's feet grew fast to the ground, where he stood for many ages like a great tree, and therefore he grew very old; he was older than an hundred men at the present day, and at last another tree grew up by the side of him, when a large snake ate them both off at the roots, and they both wandered off together. From these have sprung all the people that now inhabit the earth."

Another of their legends tells how in the time of the great freshet, which took place many centuries ago, and destroyed all the nations of the earth, all the tribes of the red men assembled on the Coteau des Prairies, to get out of the way of the waters. After they had all assembled there from all parts, the water continued to rise, until at length it covered them all in a mass, and their flesh was converted into red pipe-stone. Therefore, it has always been considered neutral ground—it belonged to all tribes alike, and all were allowed to get it and smoke together. "While they were drowning in a mass, a young woman, Ke-wap-tah-wa (the virgin), caught hold of the foot of a very large bird that was flying over, and was carried to the top of a high cliff, not far off, that was above the water. Here she had twins, and their father was the war-eagle, and her children have since peopled the earth. The pipe-stone, which is the flesh of their ancestors, is smoked by them as a symbol of peace, and the eagle's quill decorates the head of the brave."

From an article written by Hon. M. K. Armstrong, and published some years ago, we quote the following legends. The first is that of some of the tribes of the Upper Mississippi:

"Many ages after the red men were made, when all the different tribes were at war, the Great Spirit sent runners, and called them all together at the red pipe. He stood on the top of the rocks, and the red people were assembled in infinite numbers on the plains below. He took out of the rock a piece of the red stone, and made a large pipe, and smoked it over them all; told them it was part of their flesh; that though they were at war, they must meet at this place as friends; that it belonged to them all; that they must make their calumets from it, and smoke them to him whenever they wished to appease him or get his good will. The smoke from his big pipe rolled over them all, and he disappeared in its cloud. At the last whiff of his pipe a blaze of fire rolled from the rocks and melted their surface, and at the same moment two squaws went up in a blaze of fire under the two medicine rocks, where they remain to this day, and must be consulted and propitiated whenever the pipe-stone is to be taken away."

Another from the same source is one told by the Indians of the Missouri:

"The Great Spirit, at an ancient period, here called the Indian nations together, and, standing on the precipice of the red pipe-stone rocks, broke from its wall a piece, and made a huge pipe by turning it in his hand, which he smoked over them to the north, the south, the east and the west, and told them that this stone was red—that it was their flesh—that they must use it for their pipes of peace—that it belonged to them all, and that the war-club must not be raised on its ground. At the last whiff of his pipe his head went into a great cloud, and the whole surface of the rock for several miles was heated and glazed; two great ovens were opened beneath, and two women (guardian-spirits of the place) entered them in a blaze of fire, and they are heard there yet (Tso-me-cos-too and Tso-me-cos-to-wan-dee), answering to the invocations of the high priests, who consult them when they visit the sacred place."

The character of the Sioux, who is now noted for his ruthlessness, cruelty, subtlety and general lawlessness, is claimed by many to have undergone a great change since his first contact with the white race. Says one of his apologists:

"Evidences are not wanting that many of the early traders among them were a low and unscrupulous class of men, and presented to their inexperienced associates the worst phases of civilized life. Their advent upon the frontiers was almost always signalized by the introduction of whisky, or some kind of spirituous liquors, which made the Indians crazy, and incited them to the perpetration of crimes and atrocities for which the traders have been more responsible than their victims. They taught the Indians to use deception, duplicity and bad faith, by going among them to practice deceit and falsehood in their dealings. Of course there have been among the traders many noble exceptions to this charge, men who for integrity and purity of character have been unsurpassed in any of the walks of life—men who have treated the Indians with kindness and justice; and such have never failed to awaken a reciprocal response in the savage bosom. As a general rule the Indians have been peaceable and confiding, where the white people have not been the aggressors, and where their confidence has not been betrayed or their rights trespassed upon in some form."

"In estimating their character, we must make allowance for the fact—too often overlooked—that their ill-treatment has been of long standing, and that revenge for the 'old grudge' has often broken out with desolating fury. The Indian is not so easy to forgive as the white man; he has more stern justice—less of that mercy which is the result of culture—in his composition; therefore he is the proud and indomitable avenger upon all who cheat him or shed the blood of his kindred. This is a noble trait, when properly restrained, but when fired by outrage and wrong, and unrestrained, it becomes capable of deeds of fiendish atrocity and retaliation."

From another source we quote:

"It has been common to write them down as destitute of almost every good quality, as treacherous, merciless, impure and improvident—taking the worst phases of their character when exasperated by some provocation or excited by strong drink. Those the best acquainted with them are the most charitable in their judgment, and see in them many good traits, and among their best men many noble and exemplary characters. The Indian is capable of kindness, courtesy and lasting friendship. Rarely has he violated these qualities towards those who have treated him well. Illustrations of this fact almost without number could be gathered from the experience of the early pioneers in every country. Says Major Forsyth, the first Indian agent at Fort Snelling: "The Sioux Indians were celebrated for their hospitality and goodness towards strangers, and more particularly towards the whites. Anything the white man would ask them was granted, if it were possible to do so. They knew nothing about intrigue, and supposed that every person who came to the country was a friend." Hennepin, Dr. Pond, Gen. Sibley and others bear the same testimony. Farther on Major Forsyth says: "I am sorry to say that at the present day (1819) they are very much altered." The cause of this alteration he attributes to "too great intercourse with those whom we call civilized people."

On the other hand, a number of authorities see the Sioux in an entirely different light. Says the Rev. Edward Duffield Neill, in his history of Minnesota:

"The Dakotahs, like all ignorant and barbarous people, have but little reflection beyond that necessary to gratify the pleasure of revenge and of the appetite. It would be strange to find them heroes.

* * * While there are exceptions, the general characteristics are indolence, impurity and indifference to the future." He also gives an account of them diametrically opposed in almost every particular to those quoted above

The restless nature of these particular wards of the nation can readily be called to mind, the massacre of 1862, the troubles under Sitting Bull and the death of Custer and his men and the troubles at Broken Knee, being instances in the long catalogue of strife with these barbarian tribes.

Other races of Indians once peopled the territory now embraced within the state of North Dakota. Among these were the once powerful and numerous people called the Mandan, whose place of residence was west of the Missouri, and about whom so many interesting tales are told by George Catlin, the artist explorer, who spent years in their villages. These singular people, of whom there is scarcely a trace left, were of a different race, evidently, from those who surrounded them. They were of a much lighter color and more agreeable features than Sioux, Pawnee or Omaha, and had a rude civilization. In the making of pottery, the weaving of blankets and other mechanical employments they developed considerable skill. Many of their singular customs were peculiar to them, and conjecture has run rife in trying to account for their being. Many theories have been advanced, as is usual in all these cases, some believing them to be a degenerate remnant of the prehistoric races of this continent; others that they are the descendants of some white people wrecked on either coast and who had drifted inland. One of the accounts on this head, states that they are descendants of the female captives of a former race, who were spared from the wholesale destruction meted out to the rest of their people. The Indians of the plains say that the Mandans were originally white, the women having long, fair hair, and the men long blonde whiskers. They were numerous and possessed all the land, having cities, towns and villages. They had farms and herds of buffalo or bison. The story is that they were all cut off by the Abenaznis, the forefathers or forerunners of the Indians. Only a few women out of the race were spared to become the wives of their captors. But and kept aloof, and when their children were grown lived with them apart, and thus grew up a separate race. If this account is reported correctly, and probably it is, may not the white people of this Indian legend have some connection with the wanderings of that semi-civilized race, the Aztec, who finally settled in Mexico about the year 1200? They, too, were of a higher color than the other Indians and had considerable civilization.

Arickaree and Minneteeres, of Gros Ventre Indians, had many branches of their tribes in North Dakota, the former in considerable numbers. Villages of both these tribes were met with by the Lewis and Clarke expeditions in 1804-5, and by other expeditions which went up or down the Missouri.

The Cheyennes, another of the tribes who had their homes in this part of the country, were at one time one of the powerful tribes of the northwest, who bore at that period the name of Shawsays, and dwelt on a branch of the Red river. They were at deadly enmity with the Sioux who, in the end, proved too strong for them and after a long course of warfare they were driven across the Missouri. They, again, took root near the Warricane creek and established themselves in fortified villages. Still pursued with deadly animosity by the Sioux, they retreated to the Black Hills, near the upper waters of the Cheyenne river. There they lost even their name and became known to the trapper and nomadic inhabitants of the northwest by the name of the river they frequented.

Other tribes had representatives on the excellent hunting grounds of North Dakota, but the great bulk of the savages that peopled this part of our country were of the Sioux or Dakota tribes.

CHAPTER V.

FUR TRADE; COUREURS DES BOIS; TRADERS; EARLY SETTLEMENT;
THE SELKIRK SETTLEMENT; THE FUR COMPANIES; THE ROULETTES; DERIVATION OF NAME PEBINA; MISSION OF ST. JOSEPH.

For many years before any permanent settlers came to what is now North Dakota, with the idea of tilling the soil, the country along the Red river of the North, westward toward Devil's lake and Turtle mountains and on down to the Missouri was well known to the fur trader or his agent. It was the fur trade, in fact, which gave early sustenance and vitality to the Canadian provinces. Being destitute of the precious metals, at that time the leading object of American enterprise, they were long neglected by the parent country. The French adventurers who had settled on the banks of the St. Lawrence soon found that in the rich peltries of the interior they had sources of wealth that might almost rival the mines of Mexico or Peru. The Indians, as yet unacquainted with the artificial value given to some description of furs, in civilized life, brought quantities of the most precious kinds and bartered them away for European trinkets and cheap commodities. Immense profits were thus made by the early trader, and the traffic was pursued with avidity.

As the more valuable furs soon became scarce in the neighborhood of the settlements, the Indians of the vicinity were stimulated to take a wider range in their hunting expeditions. They were often accompanied on these expeditions by some of the traders or their employes, who shared in the toils and perils of the chase, and, at the same time made themselves acquainted with the best hunting grounds and with the more remote tribes with whom they came in contact.

COUREURS DES BOIS.

A new and anomalous class of men sprang up through this trade. They were called coureurs des bois, rangers of the woods. Originally men who had thus accompanied the Indians on their hunting expeditions, they now became, as it were, peddlers of the wilderness. These men would set out from Montréal with canoes well stocked with goods and with arms and ammunition, and would make their way up the many and wandering rivers, creating new wants and habitudes among the Indians, which they could supply. Sometimes they sojourned for months among the savages, assimilating to their tastes and habits with the happy facility of Frenchmen. They adopted to a certain degree, the Indian dress, and often took to themselves Indian wives.

Many of these men became so accustomed to the Indian mode of living and the perfect freedom of the wilderness, for their trips often lasted a year, before their canoe full of furs was brought to the mart, that they lost all relish for civilization and identified themselves with those with whom they dwelt, or could only be distinguished from them by their superior licentiousness. Their conduct and example, by corrupting the natives, impeded the work of the good Catholic father missionaries. To check these abuses and to protect the fur trade from various irregularities practiced by these loose adventurers, an order was issued by the French government prohibiting all persons from trading in the interior of the country, under pain of death, unless they had procured a license from the governor-general. At first these licenses were only granted to persons of respectability; to gentlemen of broken fortunes; to old officers of the army who had families to provide for; or to their widows. By degrees private licenses were, also, granted and the number which could be issued in a year first limited to twenty-five, largely increased.

Those who did not choose to fit out the expedition themselves, were permitted to sell their licenses to the merchants. These latter employed the coureurs des bois to undertake the long voyages on shares, and thus the abuses of the old system were revived.

At length it was found necessary to establish fortified posts at the confluence of various rivers and on the lakes, for the protection of the trade and for the restraint of these profligates of the wilderness. One of these posts became a great center and mart for the fur trade, that at Michilimackinac or Mackinaw.

FUR TRADERS.

Washington Irving, speaking of the French fur trading merchant, at the various posts, in those primitive days in Canada, says he "was a kind of commercial patriarch. With the lax habits and easy familiarity of his race, he had a little world of self-indulgence and misrule around him. He had his clerks, canoe-men and retainers of all kinds, who lived with him on terms of perfect sociability, always calling him by his christian name. He had his harem of Indian beauties, and his troop of half-breed children. Nor was there ever wanting a louting train of Indians hanging around the establishment, eating and drinking at his expense, in the intervals of their hunting expeditions."

The Canadians had for a long time a troublesome competition in the British merchants of New York who enticed away the Indian hunters and coureur des bois, and traded with them on more favorable terms. A still more formidable opposition was organized in the Hudson's Bay Fur Company, chartered by Charles II in 1670, with the exclusive privilege of establishing trading posts on the bay of that name and its tributary rivers. This is a privilege they retained for two centuries at least. In 1766, after the subsidence of the commercial disturbance which had grown out of the cession of Canada to England, fur traders began to push out into the wilderness. One Thomas Curry, we are told, established a trading post in the valley of the Saskatchewan and shortly after, influenced by his success, a rival, James Finley, set up a similar post in the same valley, some fifty miles further up the river. The trade in furs soon regained its old channels, but was pursued with such avidity and emulation by individual merchants that it soon transcended to its former limits. The trade was injured by their artifices to outbid and undermine each other. The Indians were debauched by the sale of spirituous liquors, which had been prohibited under French rule. Scenes of drunkenness, brutality and brawl were the consequence in the Indian villages and around the trading posts; while bloody feuds took place between rival trading parties when they met in the course of their business in the wild land.

To put an end to these sordid and ruinous contentions several of the principal merchants of Montreal formed, in the winter of 1783, a company to carry on the business. This was augmented by the absorption of a rival company in 1787. And thus was born the famous North West Company, that formidable rival to the Hudson's Bay Company. Besides these there sprang up other fur companies, both in Canada and in the United States.

For many years previous to the arrival of permanent settlers within the boundaries of what now constitutes the growing state of North Dakota the voyageurs and employes of the various fur companies ranged through its wilds and traded with the various Indian tribes on the Missouri, the Red and other rivers. These hardy men penetrated to all parts of the Dakotas, except the Black Hills, and explored it mile by mile.

About the year 1808-10, Don Manuel Lisa, a Spanish gentleman established a trading post on the upper Missouri, for the Missouri Fur Company, of St. Louis. Other posts were built in various parts of the territory by the same company in the few succeeding years. Posts, also, were established at numerous points by the other companies.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

We are told by William H. Keating, the historian, of Major Long's expedition, that visited in the neighborhood of Fort Pembina, in 1823, that at that point lived a French trader who had settled there about 1780-81. If that is the fact, and there is no reason to doubt it, this old Frenchman was the first known settler in North Dakota. His name is not given, unfortunately, by the narrator.

THE SELKIRK SETTLERS.

In 1811, Thomas Douglas, Earl of Selkirk, Scotland, obtained a grant of land from the Hudson's Bay Company, for the purpose of planting a colony of his fellow countrymen in that then wilderness. He was a wealthy, kind-hearted and philanthropic, but visionary, nobleman, and the principal idea he had was to benefit the poorer class of Scotchmen, evicted crofters and others, by removing them to a more congenial place, where they could improve their condition. He wrote several tracts for the purpose of urging the importance of colonizing British emigrants in these distant British possessions to check their disposition to emigrate to the United States. The tract of land obtained by Earl Selkirk is thus described in the deed, altering the antique and obsolete spelling.

"Beginning on the western shore of Lake Winipie, at a point in fifty-two degrees and thirty seconds north latitude and thence running due west to the Lake Winnipigashish, otherwise called Little Winipie, thence in a southerly direction through the said lake, so as to strike its western shore in latitude fifty degrees, thence due west to the place where the parallel fifty-two degrees intersects the western branch of Red river, otherwise called the Assiniboine river, thence due south from that point of intersection to the height of land which separates the waters running into Hudson's Bay from those of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers, thence in an easterly direction along the height of land to the source of the river Winipie, meaning by such last named river the principal branch of the waters which unite in the Lake Saginagas, thence along the main streams of those waters, and the middle of the several lakes through which they pass, to the mouth of the Winipie river, and thence in a northerly direction through the middle of Lake Winipie, to the place of beginning, which territory is called Ossiniboia."

In the fall of 1812 the pioneers of this settlement, a small party, arrived at about the confluence of the Assiniboine and Red river of the North, and commenced the erection of houses for themselves and for the expected colonists. The jealousy of the employes of the Northwest Company was aroused. They saw in the coming of permanent settlers the downfall of the fur trader, and upon themselves the restraints of law and order to which they were total strangers. Disguised as Indians, they drove off the settlers and induced them to go on to Pembina. The lawless coureur des bois, voyageurs, bois brules and other employes of the fur company, threatened dire disaster if they were not obeyed, and the affrighted colonists acceded. Says the Rev. Edward D. Neill, in history of Minnesota, in speaking of this event:

"These men agreed to carry the children, but the men and women were obliged to walk. The exactions of the guides were cruel. One Highlander had to relinquish a gun that had been carried by his father at the battle of Culloden, and which was prized next to the family Bible, and a shrinking woman had to part with her marriage ring which had been placed upon her finger in the bloom of her youth, by a devoted lover in the Highlands. For the sake of creating alarm, the guides would run off with the babes and children, and the distracted mothers refused to be comforted, because their children were not to be seen any more as they supposed. This sport, more worthy of bears than of men, so shocked the nervous systems of the more delicate that they never recovered, and found an early grave."

On their arrival at Pembina, which was a trading post, a fort having been built there by Lord Selkirk, that same year, they found but little accommodations, and the most hardy were compelled to pass the winter in tents. In the spring they returned to their colony, north, and resumed their interrupted labors. They toiled all the spring and summer in the cultivation of their land, but their toil was unrewarded, the birds carrying off most of the harvest. The now disheartened settlers had to return to Pembina where they passed the winter of 1813-14. They were but unsophisticated hunters, the game they could get but little, and they almost starved. In the September of 1815, the colonists numbered about two hundred. The settlement upon the lower Red river near what is now the city of Winnipeg, they called Kildonan, in memory of the parish from which so many of them came in far away, beloved Scotland. Augmented numbers, however, gave them increased confidence. Houses were built, a mill erected, and imported cattle and sheep began to graze the prairie. A frugal and industrious race, they toiled to rear their homes amid the wilderness, and to cultivate the soil. Here the hardy Scot, accustomed to the rocks and crags of his native heath, was pleased to find that

"Here no stony ground provokes the wrath of the farmer.
Smoothly the plowshare runs through the soil, as a keel through the water.
Here, too, numberless herds run wild and unclaimed on the prairies;
Here, too, lands may be had for the asking, and forests of timber,
With a few blows of the axe, are hewn and framed into houses."

All this time the agents and employes of the Northwest Company looked with considerable distrust and suspicion upon the growing settlement, even going so far as to try to stir up the savages against the innocent settlers. Things grew from bad to worse. A detailed history of these unhappy settlers, their trials and tribulations, seems fitting in this place, for though the greater part of the settlements lay north of what is now the international boundary line, still their history is linked with that of Minnesota and North Dakota to a great extent, and around Fort Pembina was gathered a part of these people who were the first to make a settlement upon the Red river of the North, for the purpose of tilling the soil and the raising of cattle.

At a meeting of the partners in the Northwest Company, held at Fort William, at the head of Lake Superior, in the summer of 1814, Duncan Cameron and Alex. McDonnell were authorized to concoct some scheme to stop the progress of the colony and to destroy it entirely. Accordingly, the two emissaries named, both energetic but unscrupulous men, arrived in August, at the Northwest Company's post, within half a mile of the settlers' village of Kildonan, at the forks of Assiniboine and Red river of the North. Cameron, a Scotchman himself, soon ingratiated himself with the Highlanders. He spoke their Gaelic tongue, he was from their native land, he extended hospitality to their family and he gained the confidence of many. He hinted, rather than spoke, disparagingly of Earl Selkirk and his plans, and with devilish cunning sowed the seeds of distrust and enmity among the simple colonists. To more thoroughly impose upon the credulous Scotch, he wore a suit of regimentals, to vey the uniform of a now disbanded company of voyageurs, of which he now signed himself as captain and commanding officer. By fair promises and specious lies, he drew off some of the colonists, who moved elsewhere, and unsettled the minds of many others. The Canadians and the employes of the company perceiving that the colonists were not in the favor of their employers, grew insolent and aggressive. One Sunday at the conclusion of religious services, one George Campbell, a disaffected Selkirk (as they were called), read a command from Captain Cameron, demanding the surrender of all the field pieces in the possession of the colonists. The following day, employes of the company, not receiving the guns, broke open the storehouse and took therefrom nine pieces of light artillery, mostly brass guns. Many disaffected settlers now left the colony, some casting in their lot with the Northwest Company. The Earl of Selkirk relates, in a statement made of these matters, that, in the spring of 1815, Morrison and McKenzie, members of the Northwest Company, took Kawtawabeta, chief of the Ojibways or Chippewas, at a meeting at Sandy lake, that they would give him and his people all the rum and other goods they had at Fort William, Leach lake and Sandy lake; if they would go on the war path against the Selkirk settlers. The chief, with a manhood which they lacked, turned from them in disgust.

June 11, which was Sunday, in the morning, a mob of the employes of the company and other ruffian hangers on, ambushed themselves in a grove near the governor's house and commenced an attack. Four settlers were wounded, one mortally. Taking the governor, Miles McDonnell, prisoner, he was sent to Montreal. Not satisfied with this, the employes, now under the leadership of Alexander McDonnell, commenced a new campaign against the peaceful settlers, seizing their horses and cattle, and devastating their farms. He even went so far as to construct a battery of two guns over against the settlement. Crushed by this treatment, dispirited and dejected, the poor colonists signified their desire to quit, and sent word to the head of the Northwest Company that they would leave their farms and go away.

On a beautiful day in the latter part of the lovely month of June, two of the Ojibway chiefs, attended by some forty grim warriors, appeared upon the scene, and offered to escort the persecuted colonists, their wives, children and property to Lake Winnipeg. Guarded jealously from the assaults of their foes by these taciturn braves, the settlers again departed from their homes, like the Acadian farmers of Grand Pre, of whom Longfellow said they set out "friendless, hopeless, homeless."

After they had embarked on the bateaux provided for them, they looked back in sorrow and pain, and beheld the flame and smoke that, started by incendiary torch, was destroying their mill and the houses they had built. But it was not long, when in their asylum on the north end of Lake Winnipeg, they were visited by Colin Robertson, a principal character in the Hudson's Bay Company, who offered to lead them back to their farms and homes from which they had been so unceremoniously and cruelly ejected. This they accepted, and returned under his leadership, and their number was considerably augmented by some fresh arrivals from "bonnie Scotland." During the winter the majority of them remained at Fort Pembina, and hunted the buffalo on the prairies of northern Minnesota and Dakota. Early in the spring of 1816 they returned to Kildonan. In the meantime, the good Earl of Selkirk, hearing of the distress of his colony, crossed the ocean, but on his arrival in New York, in the autumn of 1815, heard how they had been driven from their homes. He proceeded at once to Montreal, where he found some of his colonists, who had been seduced by the people of the Northwest Company, in great indigence and neglect. While in that city he received the information that Robertson had taken his people back to their homes, and that they had again settled down to develop the land. He immediately sent back, by Laguimoniere, the courier who had brought the news, the word of his arrival in this country, and to announce his coming in the early spring. The messenger never reached his destination with the message. Near Fond du Lac, Minnesota, one night he was waylaid, beaten, robbed of his dispatches and his canoe, and taken prisoner. An Ojibway chief, in June, 1816, testified at Sandy lake, that a trader named Grant, offered him two kegs of rum and considerable tobacco if he would send some of his men and capture the bearer of dispatches to the Red river. Shortly after this the messenger Laguimoniere was brought in prisoner by a negro and some Indians of the Ottawa tribe.

In the spring of 1816, Duncan Cameron, on his return to the scene of his former persecution of innocent settlers, was placed under arrest, by Colin Robertson, and taken north to the shores of Hudson's Bay for shipment to London, to stand trial.

Not being able to procure military aid of the British government in Canada, Lord Selkirk hired four officers and eighty privates of the discharged Meuron regiment, twenty of the DeWatteville regiment and several members of the Glangery Fenicians, all of whom had served in the late war with the United States. His contract with these men was that they were to receive monthly wages for navigating the boats to the Red river settlement, to have lands given them if they wished to stay there or a free passage home if they desired to return. On reaching the Sault Ste. Marie, he learned that once more his colony had been broken up by the lawless fur traders.

It seems that in the spring of 1816, Governor Robert Semple, an amiable, but injudicious and tactless man, who was governor of the factories and territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, came to the Red river. In April he sent one Pambrun to a trading post in a neighboring river, and as that party was returning with five boats, a quantity of furs and pemmican, they were attacked and captured May 12, by an armed party of the friends and employes of the Northwest Company. They said this was in retaliation for an attack made by Colin Robertson on their fort at the confluence of the Assiniboine and Red rivers the previous fall. The lawless element in all the wide country began to flock to the headquarters of both of the rival fur companies.

On the 18th of June, 1816, a party of "Northwesters" left Fort Qui Appele, under the command of Cuthbert Grant, Lacerpe, Frazer, Hooley and Thos. McKay. These marched toward Red river. Warned by friendly Indians of the approach of a hostile force, vigilant watch was kept for the arrival of the advancing enemy. June 19, at about five o'clock in the afternoon, the lookouts announced the appearance of a body of mounted men. With a spy glass the governor discovered that the party consisted of sixty or seventy horsemen. With a reckless disregard of the commonest dictates of caution or prudence, he proceeded to sally out of the fort with twenty men and met them. About half a mile on his road he met some of the settlers hurrying to the fort. These reported that the approaching party were armed with artillery. The governor sent back to the fort for a field piece. Without waiting for it however, he pressed on, and was soon surrounded. One Boucher, the reckless, drunken son of a Montreal innkeeper, was put forward as spokesman by the hostiles. Semple inquired what they wanted. Boucher insolently answered, "Why did you destroy our fort, rascal?" With more courage than prudence, the governor grasped the bridle of Boucher's horse as he exclaimed, "Scoundrel, do you talk thus to me?" Boucher sprang from his horse and the party that was with him immediately commenced firing. Semple was soon wounded, and called to his followers to disperse and take care of themselves and leave him to his fate. Instead they gathered round their fallen chief. As they did this a volley from the Northwest party killed nearly all of them. The rest asked for quarter but this was denied and the rest were murdered with the exception of four or five. One of those thus spared, John Pritchard, has narrated the story of these murders by these ruthless demi-savages. He says that, "the knife, axe or ball put an end to the existence of the wounded, and on the bodies of the dead were practiced all those horrible barbarities, which characterize the inhuman heart of the savages. The amiable and mild Mr. Semple, with broken thigh, lying on his side, supporting his head upon his hand, said to Grant, the leader of the attacking party, 'I am not mortally wounded, and if you could get me conveyed to the fort, I think I should live.' Grant promised he would do so, and immediately left him in care of a Canadian who afterwards told that an Indian of their party came up and shot Mr. Semple in the breast. I entreated Grant to procure me the watch or even the seals of Mr. Semple, for transmitting them to his friends, but I did not succeed. Our force amounted to twenty-eight persons, of whom twenty-one were killed." Schoolcraft, writing in 1832, says he saw at Leech lake, Majegabowi, and Ojibway, who was said to have been the identical Indian who shot Semple as he lay wounded on the ground.

The morning after this massacre Grant and his followers insisted on the abandonment of the fort and settlement. Next day the colonists, to the number of some two hundred embarked in boats to be taken to the coast. Other murders occurred about this time growing out of the feud between the rival fur companies. In all this strife and bitterness it seems it was the Selkirkers who were the principal sufferers.

Previous to receiving the news of the murder of Governor Semple, the Earl of Selkirk had made his plans to go to his colony by way of Fond du Lac, St. Louis river, and Red lake. He now changed his mind. He went to Fort William, the chief trading post of the Northwest Company, on Lake Superior, and arrested the principal partners and forwarded them to the attorney general of Canada.

After this stroke of justice Lord Selkirk pursued his journey as intended, and spent the summer of 1817 with his colony. The harvest that year was luxuriant, but owing to their troubles the settlers had sown but little, and when the winter came on they began to be pinched for food. Unsusited as they were to the rough life of settlers, hardy but unsophisticated in the ways of the wilderness, these people suffered to an untold degree, and were hungered and famished where the Indian or Canadian reveled in every luxury in the meat or game line. It became necessary for the settlers to support themselves through the long winter by hunting. They proceeded into the open prairies of northern Minnesota to join a camp of Indian and half-breed hunters. Being unprovided with snow shoes, they plunged on through the ever-deepening snow, suffering all kinds of martyrdom and misery. On Christmas eve, 1817, these half starved colonists, in rags, worn out by their exertions, and without a crumb of food among them, reached the camp they sought.

While on his visit to the colony Lord Selkirk had made a treaty with the Crees and Saulteaux Indians, July 18, 1817, by which he acquired title to land on both sides of the Red river of the North, extending as far south as the Great Forks (now Grand Forks). Part of this strip was only four miles wide, in others, especially around Fort Douglas and Fort Daer (Pembina), it was twelve. After remaining for awhile Lord Selkirk departed, attended by three or four persons, by way of the Minnesota and Mississippi rivers, going to St. Louis, Missouri, and from thence home.

The American officials upon the frontier, as a general thing, looked, also, upon this colonization scheme of the Earl of Selkirk's with jealousy and distrust. The following letter, written by the Indian agent at Prairie du Chien, in February, 1818, to the governor of Illinois, illustrates the feeling at that time rife in the far northwest. It is quoted from the History of the Minnesota Valley, published in 1882. After opening his letter, the agent, hysterically, writes:

"What do you suppose, sir, has been the result of the passage through my agency of this British nobleman? Two entire bands, and part of a third, all Sioux, have deserted us and joined Dickson, who has distributed to them large quantities of Indian presents, together with flags, medals, etc.

Knowing this, what must have been my feelings on hearing that his lordship had met with a favorable reception at St. Louis. The newspapers announcing his arrival, and general Scottish appearance, all tend to discompose me; believing, as I do, that he is plotting with his friend Dickson our destruction—sharpening the savage scalping knife, and colonizing a tract of country so remote as that of the Red river for the purpose, no doubt, of monopolizing the fur and peltry trade of this river, the Missouri and their waters, a trade of the first importance to our western states and territories. A courier who had arrived a few days since confirms the belief that Dickson is endeavoring to undo what I have done, and secure to the British government the affection of the Sioux and subject the Northwest Company to his Lordship."

The spring of 1818 at last dawned, and the colonists again plucked up heart and began to put in the crops. They watched, with eagerness, the development of the tender plants, and in joyous anticipation awaited the harvest time. Their hopes were again blasted, this time not by the hand of man, but by that scourge that, in later times, has repeated the work of devastation, the grasshopper. Let us quote once more from Dr. Neill, who says:

"One afternoon, just as the harvest was ripe, and they were about to put in the sickle, 'behold the Lord formed grasshoppers, in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth,' and their joy was turned to mourning. The air was filled with these insects; 'the earth did quake before them, like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains, or like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble,' was the sound of their movements." When the next morning arose, 'it was a day of darkness and of gloominess; a day of clouds and thick darkness,' and strong men were bowed down; and like the Hebrew captives, 'by the waters of Babylon, they lifted up their voices and wept.'"

The following year the calamity was worse and more complete, if that were possible. Ross, in his account of this plague, says: "They were produced in masses, two, three and four inches in depth. The water was infected by them. Along the river they were to be found in heaps like sea-weed, and might be shoveled with a spade. Every vegetable substance was either eaten up or stripped to the bare stalks; the leaves of the bushes and the bark of the trees shared the same fate, and the grain vanished as fast as it appeared above the ground.

Even fires, if kindled out of doors, were immediately extinguished by them."

Desolation reigned supreme. "The land was as the Garden of Eden before them, and behind then a desolate wilderness. Nothing did escape them." They ran upon the walls of the houses, they invaded the homes of the settlers, and everything that was edible they devoured. As winter again came down upon them these poor colonists, with aching hearts and bewildered heads, were again compelled to depend upon hunting to sustain themselves and their families from starvation. This was a mode of life at variance with their rearing and repugnant to their finer feelings. The vagabond life of the hunter had no charms for them.

As everything had gone into the maw of the voracious grasshopper, they were entirely out of grain and knew not where to look for seed for the coming springtime. In the winter of 1819-20 a delegation of the colonists pushed their way through the snows and cold, at imminent risk and great bodily hardship, across the prairies and through the forests of northern Minnesota to Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi, to purchase seed wheat. This was a trip of seven or eight hundred miles in a climate not remarkable for its mildness, and the men were but thinly clad. They, however, succeeded in reaching their destination. In the spring they were ready to return. On the 15th of April, with three Mackinaw boats or batteaux, manned by six hands each, laden with two hundred bushels of wheat, one hundred bushels of oats and thirty bushels of peas, they set out. The expedition was under the command and guidance of Messrs. Graham and Laidlaw. They were detained by the ice in Lake Pepin, on the Mississippi, which had not gone out as yet, but on the 3d of May the passage was open and the boats passed through. Up the Mississippi to the mouth of the Minnesota river and thence up the latter to its headwaters they pushed their way with toil. The road was long and wearisome, the labor great, but they persisted faithfully. Finally they emerged into the waters of Big Stone lake. Pushing their way through this they reached its northwest shore. Here a portage of a mile and a half of land separated them from Lake Traverse. Putting improvised wooden rollers under their boats, they, at the expense of infinite toil, pushed them across the divide and again launched them with the proper element. Descending the Sioux Wood river over to its junction with the Red river of the North, they had the latter waterway for the balance of their journey. The party reached Pembina June 3. The trip performed by these boats is worthy of mention, as it is the only instance of heavy articles being transported from Prairie du Chien to the Red river settlements entirely by water, with the exception of the portage mentioned above. The cost of this expedition, about six thousand dollars, was borne by Lord Selkirk. In 1820 some Swiss were induced to leave their native home, by agents of the Earl of Selkirk, and come to his colony. Many of these, on reaching Fort Snelling, discouraged and disheartened at the misrepresentations that had brought them from their mountain homes, would go no farther, but settled in the region where now stands St. Paul. The rest went on to Pembina. In 1823 Major S. H. Long, who visited the settlement at Pembina, as elsewhere related, found it to consist of some sixty log cabins, and contained a population of about three hundred and fifty people. Most of these were half-breeds. The remainder of the people were Scotch and Swiss, who did not strike the members of the expedition as people well qualified for settlers upon the rugged frontier. Most of the Swiss were old soldiers whose days of usefulness in their trade were over, and were unfitted by their training for agricultural pursuits. The Scotch were thrifty and industrious, but Mr. Keating thought that the half bloods were useless as farmers.

One of the objects of Major Long's expedition was the location of the international boundary line, and when this was finally determined it was found that Fort Daer, or Pembina, was built upon soil within the jurisdiction of the United States. It was, therefore, dismantled and removed to the Canadian side of the border. This terminated the connection of that part of the northwest with the Earl of Selkirk and his schemes, as most of the Selkirkers, as they were called, still loyal to their patron, removed to the vicinity of Fort Garry, now Winnipeg. Of their presence around Pembina naught remains. Even their burial place, if any existed there, is unknown. Some debris turned up by the plow from time to time, an old cellar or two or half rotten timbers here and there, are all that would show their occupancy. The tale of their trials and tribulations are all that we have to show for the struggle they made against adverse fate. A few of the Selkirkers, however, remained upon our soil, adapting themselves to their new country, for, when the United States sent a force to rebuild Fort Pembina in 1870, they found a few descendants of the Selkirk settlers still living there.

Among other prominent figures in the history of the early part of the century was one by the name of Fisher, an agent of the Hudson's Bay Company. For years prior to 1815 he was stationed at Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin. In 1824 he located on the shores of Lake Traverse, at the headwaters of the Red river of the North, and engaged in fur trading. He remained there until 1826. His daughter married Joseph Rollette, the elder, but was afterward divorced and married Hercules L. Dousman, for many years a leading and influential citizen of Prairie du Chien.

As time in its course neared the middle of the century, communication between the Red river valley and the outside world became all the more frequent. Cart routes leading to the head of navigation on the Mississippi began to be established by traders who, independent of the fur companies, began to locate at Pembina and other points. Mendota, near Fort Snelling, became the objective point of the Red river cart trails through Minnesota for many years before St. Paul was founded.

The aristocracy of the plains in those times consisted of the officers, traders and clerks at the posts, and the buffalo hunters. While the Selkirk colonists generally dressed in homespun clothing, and lived plainly, the men at the posts had every luxury that they could procure, including a stock of the finest liquors. The importation of some of the finer products of civilized life gradually became more common, even to silk dresses for the women of the posts. In dress, the trappers and voyageurs and some other of the employes of the fur companies used a common sort of cloth that was imported, gray suits being much worn by them. With these classes there was also some admixture of vestments, made from the skins of animals, especially buckskin, and suits of this character were worn much by the half-breeds. Of the smaller kinds of fur-bearing animals the country at that period produced quite a variety.

During each recurring summer ensued the annual buffalo hunt, the chief event of the year. The bison was a migratory animal and in winter ranged southward to northern Texas. The increasing warmth of spring, which in that latitude ensues early, urged these animals to take to their northwardly leading trails, and they migrated in vast herds. The hunting parties of the Northwest assembled at some appointed place between June 8 and 18. Sometimes as many as a thousand or more persons took part in these hunts, their caravans sometimes consisting of as many as six hundred carts. The hunters were accompanied by their women and children. They were mainly half-breeds, with some Indians and occasionally a few whites. Bands from some of the posts in Manitoba also joined them. Scouts were first sent out to locate the herds, and on their return, the leaders having heard their reports, they determined from them the direction of the march to the prairies. The bison, like other wild animals, instinctively avoided all localities inhabited by man. The buffalo ranges of the Northwest were along the Cheyenne, the Mouse, the neighborhood of the Turtle mountains, and the upper portion of the Red river valley. Reaching any of these ranges, the hunters attacked the herds on horseback, using long stocked guns with flint lock fire, and slew these animals in large numbers. The remainder of the herd stampeded away with a loud noise, raising a great cloud of dust. The men skinned the animals for their hides, and the women assisted in cutting up the meat and loading it into the carts for transportation to camp, where it was cut into strips and dried for winter's use, and for making pemmican. The tongues of the buffalo were considered a choice part of these animals. The hides were brought to the post for shipment with other peltries.

The guns used in the Northwest were made in England especially for purposes connected with the fur trading business. They were imported by way of York factory and exchanging at the posts for peltries at certain values. They continued to have flint locks long after the percussion cap had come into general use, on account of the great distance to the points at which the latter might be obtained. If an Indian or other hunter got out of his supply of percussion caps, on the supposition that he used them, it might be a hundred or more miles from the nearest post, a percussion lock gun would be of no use, while the flint-lock gun was serviceable at any time.

There were some salt springs in the country that were utilized to some extent by the Selkirk colonists and the fur companies, on account of the expense of importing salt. "Considerable quantities," says Warren Upham, "were yearly made by the evaporation of the water of salt springs. One of these springs from which much salt was made for the Hudson's Bay Company is situated in the channel of the south branch of Two Rivers, about one and one-half miles above its junction with the north branch and some six miles west of Hallock. It is exposed only when the river runs low, and in such portion of the summer the work of salt-making was done."

Just after the last war with Great Britain, in about 1815, Captain Duncan Graham, a Scotchman, settled in what was subsequently called Graham's Island, in Devil's lake, or Lake Minnewaukan. There he erected a trading post and remained for a number of years. Augustus Rock, a French-Canadian, established a trading post, also, on an island in the same lake, probably about 1819 or 1820, and made it his home for some years. Rock Island is named after him.

FUR COMPANIES.

For years the fur trading business had been in the hands of various rival companies, who were united in but one thing, to keep the business to themselves and to drive out all intruders. Among these were the famous Hudson's Bay Company, the Northwest Company, American Fur Company, Missouri Fur Company, X. Y. Fur Company and others. The Columbia Fur Company was organized in 1822, by parties formerly in the employe of the older organizations. The Rocky Mountain Fur Company was organized in 1826, and sent agents up the Missouri river. In 1832 the American Fur Company, of which John In 1832 the American Fur Company, of which John Jacob Astor, the founder of the present Astor family, was the originator, became the leading one in the northwest, and through them the fur trading business took on a more permanent form. About 1840 independent traders began to establish themselves at various points throughout the Red River valley and elsewhere.

THE ROLETTES.

One of the best known employes of the American Fur Company in those early days was Jean Joseph Rolette, most always called Joe Rolette, the elder. He was a French-Canadian of the province of Quebec, who had been educated, it is believed, for the priesthood, but the bold, adventurous spirit within him drew him into the ranks of the coureur des bois, who roamed the lakes, woods and rivers of Canada and the United States. His native ability and the advantages of superior education soon placed him in the foremost ranks and he soon became a successful trader. He was a captain in the British service during the last war with Great Britain, and helped take Prairie du Chien. He married a Miss Fisher, who became the mother of Joseph Rolette, Jr., but was afterward divorced from her. He died, after having been one of the most noted of traders, in poverty.

Joseph Rolette, Jr., his son, was probably the best known of all the traders of the great Northwestern territory in that day. Taken by relatives of his mother to New York, he was reared and educated where he had the best of advantages. As he grew to manhood the spirit of adventure, born in him, came out, and he determined to join the band of bold spirits upon the northern frontier. Enthusiastic, bold, witty, well educated and shrewd beyond his years, he was well fitted for border life. He came west and took service with a company which had been formed in 1834, of which Henry H. Sibley, Ramsey Crooks, H. L. Dousman and Jean Joseph Rolette were partners. By them he was sent to the Red river valley and he made his appearance there in 1840-41. He rebuilt the post at Pembina. At the time he was but twenty-one or two years of age. For a young man of that time in life to take charge of a reckless crew of voyageurs, build and defend the fort, employ and control the half-breeds upon whom the greater part of the actual labor fell, successfully deal with the friendly Indians and combat those that were hostile, to cure, pack and ship large quantities of furs, keep account of all his transactions and show a profit on each season's work, shows he was a young man of no common mettle. Young Rolette started his first line of carts between Pembina and St. Paul. This scheme was evolved in his brain and put into execution in 1842, and in it a Mr. Fisher, his mother's brother, was a partner. In 1843 the well-known Norman W. Kittson, a native of Canada, born March 5, 1814, came to Pembina and took charge of the post, from which time, as the business had developed largely, Joseph Rolette served as his chief lieutenant. Commodore Kittson saw that Rolette's idea of a regular cart line to St. Paul was an excellent one, and immediately inaugurated another. This mode of transport and traffic grew to an immense size, some years reaching the unprecedented figure of six or seven thousand carts employed. Other posts were, about this time, established at St. Joseph (Hair Hills) now Walhalla, at Devil's lake, and in the Turtle mountains. In 1844 a mail station was established at the Pembina posts by Norman W. Kittson, and it is believed he was appointed the first postmaster.

DERIVATION OF THE NAME PEMBINA.

It is recorded that Kittson gave the name of this post that it bears to-day, Pembina. According to Mr. Keating, the historian of Long's expedition, quoted elsewhere, this word is an abbreviation or corruption of the Ojibway word, Anepeminansippi, or the river of the red berry. This was the name given to the river by the Indians on account of the red berry, the viburnum exyococos of the botanists, that grew in such luxuriant abundance along both banks.

In an article in the Record, a well-edited magazine published at Fargo in the interest of old settlers and historical events, exception is taken to this derivation. The paragraph is here quoted in full:

"In Neill's history of Minnesota it is stated that Pembina county takes its name from the high bush cranberry, called by the Ojibways Anepeminan. This writer investigated the origin of the word Pembina some years ago, especially among those familiar with the Indian language, and reached the conclusion that it came from a combination of Pemmican and the Latin word 'bena,' meaning 'blessed bread.' Senator Bogy made exhaustive research when the bill for the creation of Pembina territory was before the senate, and succeeded in defeating the use of that name on the ground that it had neither local or historical significance. It was his opinion that if it meant anything it was "sanctified bread." Fred Girard, who lived forty years among the Indians, states that the Indians and breeds would assemble at stated times at St. Joseph for the administration of the Holy Eucharist, designating the event as 'Pembina.' The Record believes Neill wrong. Dr. Neill gives the significance of the name Dakota as 'allied tribes,' but Girard says 'a land of plenty,' or 'many people,' is better. 'Sota,' always meaning plenty in the language of the Sioux, 'Minnesota' means many waters, instead of 'smoky water' 'clear water,' or 'sky tinted water,' as claimed by Neill." By another authority the word Pembina is given as the shortening of the Ojibway words Nepin, or summer, and Minan berry, after the high-bush cranberry.

Troubles at all times kept Joseph Rolette, Jr., busy at his posts, trouble with all kinds of people, civilized and savage. In 1847 some rival traders set up a post not over two miles from Rolette's, and as they were ready to pay in whisky for furs, a practice not allowed by our government, they had the advantage of him. Others had suffered in the same way, and as the government failed to protect him Rolette determined to take the matter into his own hands. He gathered a few of his most plucky men and, with them, marched over the line, threw out their goods upon the ground, burned down the buildings and bade the owners leave that part of the country, which they immediately did. In 1851 Joseph Rolette was elected a member of the Minnesota legislature, and was re-elected in 1853, 1855 and 1857. On the outbreak of the Civil war he tried to get a commission in the Union army, but failed, and at the close of hostilities he had lost most of his little fortune and much of his former health. He died May 16, 1871. He, in 1845, married Angelie Jerome, a lady of half Chippewa blood, and was the father of eleven children, some of whom are now residents of the state.

MISSION OF ST. JOSEPH.

But to return to the earlier times, it is recorded that in 1840 Rev. G. A. Bellecourt, who had for some nine years been doing missionary work among the natives north of the border, built a church just north of the present site of Pembina, near the junction of the Red and Pembina rivers. Father Bellecourt, a devout and pious member of the Roman Catholic priesthood, was a native of Canada, and gave most of his life to work among the Indians and the bois brules of the Northwest. He wrote a dictionary and grammar of the Indian tongue. He was missionary apostolic and vicar-general of Bishop Cretin in 1853. He was well and favorably known to all and well beloved by both reds and whites of that region. He died in Menramcook, Iles de la Madeline, Canada, in 1874. In 1845 this good and pious missionary pushed out into what was for many years called the Hair Hills, about thirty miles west of the Red river, just where the Pembina river breaks from the more elevated land called the Pembina mountains, and there built a chapel, which was dedicated to St. Joseph. Later a convent sprang up there, and there Father Bellecourt erected a mill. This was the first mill west of St. Paul, on American ground.

EARLY PERMANENT SETTLEMENT.

Most of the people in this locality, all this time, were not settlers in the sense that we use the word to-day; they came, for the most part, as agents or employes of the fur traders, and their stay was generally, precarious and uncertain. They did not attempt to cultivate the soil, for, with the exception of small vegetable gardens at the posts, the land was entirely untilled. They took up no land with the intent to settle down to develop it; they were hunters and trappers only. But the time was coming when this was to change, when the day of the hunter and trapper was to pass; when the land that then lay in idleness and covered with the luxuriant growth of nature should be trained and tamed to the uses of civilized man; when the farm and the cottage of the husbandman was to take the place of the hunting ground and the cabin of the trapper or the teepee of the red man.

The pioneer of the pioneers in the Red river valley, and in the state of North Dakota, was Charles Cavileer, who came to this point in 1851, as United States collector of customs. A sketch of Mr. Cavileer will be found in another department of this work.

The next to make a settlement in what is now North Dakota was William H. Moorhead, a man of sterling virtues and excellent qualities. Of him, it is justly said that a history of the state without mentioning his many services in the development of the land would be incomplete and lame. He was a man, every inch of him, faithful to friends, forgiving to his enemies if they deserved it, but relentless to the evil doer. He practiced the famous law of the Brahmin, "Love thy friend; do justice to thine enemy."

William H. Moorhead was a native of Freeport, Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, born September 20, 1832. In the schools of Pittsburg and its sister city, Allegheny, he was reared and educated, and there grew to early manhood. In the spring of 1852 he left his home in the Keystone state and sought in the wild northwest a wider field for his efforts, a place for him to expand. About the first of May of that year he arrived at St. Paul, Minnesota, and at that place remained some two years, working at his trade, that of a carpenter. The summer of 1854 and the ensuing winter were spent by him at Sauk Rapids trading with the Indians. In the spring of 1855 he returned to St. Paul and formed a company to lay out town sites in northern

Minnesota, a favorite speculation of those days. This syndicate consisted of Messrs. Moorhead, Hoffman, Hutchinson, Kellogg, Horn, Charles and Traill. All were residents of St. Paul at the time. William Moorhead, Joseph Charles and J. K. Hoffman formed the active part of the concern and started out to find the town sites. With the surveyor they went by canoe up the Mississippi and Crow Wing rivers to Leaf river, and by the latter to Leaf Lake. A portage of three or four miles brought them to Otter Tail lake, and at the outlet of this they surveyed and laid out a town. This they called Otter Tail City. About forty miles down the river they laid out another, to which they gave the name of Merriam. On returning to St. Paul they found that lots of this description were a drug upon the market, too many had them for sale all through the west, and the Eastern speculator was growing timorous. Although the syndicate mentioned above held their property as worth $150,000, they wanted for the common necessities of life, and Mr. Moorhead is said to have paid his winter's board bill with a share of stock in the enterprise. In the spring, the bubble having burst, the financial panic of the year 1857 having set in, Mr. Moorhead was without anything to do. He finally engaged with Joseph Rolette and James McPettridge, who were in St. Paul, to erect the new buildings at the mouth of the Pembina river, which they intended to build. They arrived at their point of destination August 1, 1857. Mr. Moorhead completed the buildings and then entered the store as clerk and remained until February, 1858. He made trips to St. Paul for supplies and made successful hunting expeditions in the valley until the following fall. He then sought the Chippewas, at Lake of the Woods and Lake Rosa, and was rewarded by a heavy trade in furs. He had now embarked as an independent fur trader, and that winter made a trip to the west, to the Turtle mountains. He was very successful in all his endeavors. In 1861 he removed to what is now Walhalla, then St. Joseph, he engaged in trade with the Indians. He resided there when the Indian massacre of 1863 broke out in Minnesota. He was on good terms with the savages, but as he would not sell them ammunition, he thought it best to move, so went to Devil's lake, where he and some hundred families of Indians and half-breeds spent the summer of that eventful year and the following winter. The spring following he returned to his place at the foot of the Pembina mountains. In May of that year the tribes of Little Six, Medicine Bottle and Little Crow pitched their teepees about his place. These tribes numbered in the neighborhood of a thousand Indians. A prisoner, a son of William Myrick, a child of eight years, was bought from them. That fall Mr. Moorhead married Lizzie Lauvier and made a wedding trip to the famous hunting grounds of the Souris or Mouse river. He built a house about a mile and a half from the present site of Towner, McHenry county. He remained there all winter in trade with the Sioux. Mr. Moorhead died at Pembina, July 3, 1897, respected by all, and was buried with Masonic honors on the nation's birthday. To quote from the Pembina Express:

"Personally, Mr. Moorhead was genial, simple hearted, generous. He was public-spirited, and in the days when Pembina was very far from civilization, when its population was largely made up of a lawless class of men, Mr. Moorhead was made the first sheriff, an office at that time requiring courage and tact of no mean order. His early life was amid associations of the far frontier type, and it would be strange indeed if the tree did not partake to some extent of the qualities of the soil from which it grew. But at the bedside of the sick and dying, this rough frontiersman was as tender as a woman, as thoughtful and gentle as a trained nurse, and when there was suffering he was always depended upon, and it seemed but natural that he should perform the last sad offices for the dead. Despite his faults, he was universally liked, and among the old settlers a particular favorite."

About the same time that Mr. Moorhead came to the Pembina settlement the steam navigation of the Red river of the North began to occupy the minds of those interested and commenced to develop. In all this western country there has been, prior to the advent of railroads, an era of steamboating that grew and flourished into a great industry until the railroads killed it off. They no doubt were an important factor in the advancement, settlement and civilization of the states west of the Mississippi river. But a few years ago, comparatively, the northern waters of the Mississippi were alive with craft, carrying the freight and transporting the passengers of that region. Now there are but few of the river craft. The same is true of all our western rivers.

The Red river of the North, which is neither wide nor deep, was practically navigable from Wahpeton to its mouth. The river is very crooked, although never departing far from a straight meridian in its course through North Dakota. It travels nearly four hundred miles in traversing the one hundred and eighty-six miles from Wahpeton to the international boundary line. At Wahpeton the river, at its ordinary stage, is 943 feet above sea level; the altitude of Lake Winnipeg is 710 feet, hence the fall of the navigable part of the river amounts to 233 feet. For twelve miles as the river runs, next below the mouth of the Goose, the stream crosses a morainic belt, and its bed is obstructed with boulders, forming the Goose rapids. The fall in this part of the river is twelve feet in as many miles. In the earlier days of steamboat navigation these rapids were a hindrance to the passage of boats during the season of low water. Below Winnipeg an outcrop of limestone causes a lower set of rapids. The rise of the river during the highest spring floods is as follows at the different places named: Wahpeton, 15 feet; Fargo, 32 feet; Belmont, 50 feet; Grand Forks, 44 feet; Pembina, 40 feet, and at Winnipeg, 39 feet. These figures indicate what is called the range between extreme low and high water. The maximum point of extreme high water is at Belmont on account of the narrowed channel of the river between high banks of compact boulder clay; the next point of extreme high water level at Grand Forks is connected with the entrance into the Red at that place of the Red Lake river. The years in which extraordinary floods have occurred on Red river, and been recorded, are those of 1826, 1852, 1860, 1861, 1882 and 1897. Down to 1890, congressional appropriations for improving the river in the interests of navigation amounted to $128,000. The first of these appropriations was made in 1876.

In October, 1858, Captain Russell Blakely, of St. Paul, in company with John R. Irvine, made a trip up the Red river. They reached the river at Fort Abercrombie, which they found in charge of Captain Nelson H. Davis and Lieutenant P. Hawkins, of the Second United States Infantry, with their company. They made observations in regard to the possibilities of navigation on the stream. In consequence of the report made by Captain Blakely the chamber of commerce of St. Paul agreed to pay a bonus of $2,000 to the first steamboat to navigate the waters of the Red river.

Anson Northrup bought the steamboat North Star, then running on the Mississippi river. He took it up the river and laid it up at Crow Wing. The machinery in it was old and patched. It had been brought originally from Maine and placed in the Governor Ramsey, and later in the North Star. All winter was put in in getting out new lumber for a boat, and in the spring of 1859 lumber and machinery was hauled across to Lafayette, at the mouth of the Cheyenne. Thirty-four teams were employed in this hauling. The boat was speedily put together and launched, and christened the Anson Northrup. The boat ran to Fort Abercrombie, from which point it left for Fort Garry, now Winnipeg, May 17, and arrived at the latter place June 5, 1859. After her return to Fort Abercrombie with twenty passengers, Captain Blakely and the others interested in her continuing her trips were coolly informed that, as it had earned the bonus and there was no money in running it, if they wanted it to run they could buy it. She was afterward purchased by J. C. Burbank for the Minnesota Company.

One of the pioneer settlers of the Red river valley, Nicholas Huffman, in a paper read at the Old Settlers' meeting, in 1898, says:

"There was an old steamboat lying in the Minnesota river, six miles below Big Stone lake, which was intended to come over into the Red river in 1857. There was a big flood in the Minnesota river and Captain John B. Davis thought he could run the Freighter, for that was the name of the boat, into the Red river, but the waters went down and the boat was left stranded. The boat was sold at sheriff's sale and was bought by J. C. Burbank, of the stage company. There was a Welshman left in charge of the boat, and here he stayed nearly four years away from wife and children, with nothing to eat, only what he could hunt or fish.

"In the fall of 1860 we took a lot of teams, wagons and tools, under orders from Burbank, and took the boat to pieces and brought it to Georgetown. We found the boat and the little Welshman all right. His hair had over three years' growth and his whiskers were long. You may be sure his clothes were not of the latest fashion or in first-class condition. Coffee sacks, window curtains, etc., had been used to keep him covered. We divided up our clothes with him, but they were not good fits as he was so small.

"A second trip was necessary for the machinery. There were two big boilers, but we brought them safely to Georgetown, where the boat was rebuilt. We did not reach Georgetown till after Christmas with the last load, and the weather was very cold. The water was bad and the men suffered a great deal."

The Minnesota Company mentioned above was the result of the mail contract letting in 1858, and was organized by J. C. Burbank, Russell Blakely and others. They had the contracts for carrying the mail from St. Paul to Fort Abercrombie and other northwestern points. They proposed to open roads and put on stages to run from St. Cloud via Cold Springs, New Munich, Melrose, Winnebago Crossing, Sauk Rapids, Mendota, Osakis, Alexandria, Dayton and Breckenridge, to Fort Abercrombie. The party left St. Cloud in June, 1859, to open this route. Accompanying the expedition, besides teamsters, bridge builders, station keepers and laborers, were Miss Elenora and Christiana Sterling from Scotland, Sir Francis Sykes and others. Northrup having refused to operate the steamboat, those bound for the north, including the baronet and the ladies, caused to be built a flatboat at Abercrombie and they went down the river in it to Fort Garry. George W. Northrup was in charge of this, one of the first boats on the Red river. This Northrup was a noted character in this part of the country at the time. He was one of the most popular of the famous frontiersmen, and for years was employed as guide and hunter by military expeditions and hunting parties, and his name figures in most of the stories told by old settlers in the Red river valley and the vicinity. He served as sergeant in Company C, Brackett's Battalion, and was killed in a combat with the Indians on the headwaters of the Little Missouri, July 28, 1864.

In the spring of 1860 the steamboat was repaired, rechristened the Pioneer, and, under the command of Captain Samuel Painter, it made trips all that summer. This same year the machinery of the Freighter, mentioned above, having been hauled to Georgetown, a boat was constructed there into which it was put, and the second steamer, the International, entered upon the trade of the river. A. W. Kelley saved the lumber and Edwin R. Abell put in the engines. C. V. P. Lull operated the steamer for a few trips, but was succeeded by Norman W. Kittson. One of the causes of the complaints of the Indians which led to the hostilities and massacre of 1862 was the objection of the red men to steamboats on the rivers. They argued that they drove away the game and killed the fish, and that the noise of the whistles disturbed the repose of their dead ancestors. They demanded four kegs of gold money or that the boats cease running. In 1864 the International was sold to the Hudson's Bay Company. The opposition of this famous and powerful organization to the settlement of the valley, it being against their interests, proved too strong, and any development was out of the question until the termination of the charter of that company by the British government in 1869.

In the meantime a few had made homes in the Red river valley, mostly French-Canadians and mixed-bloods. H. D. Betts was appointed by Governor William Jaynes to take a census of this part of the territory early in 1861, and by his sworn statement made July 26, 1861, it is seen that the whole number of white males in the Red river valley, on the Dakota side of the river, was fifty-one, of whom forty-two were over twenty-one years of age. The number of white women was twenty-five. The mixed bloods amounted to two hundred and sixty-four males and two hundred and sixty females; a total population of six hundred. At the St. Joseph settlement, then the most prominent, it is said by a local writer, there resided in 1861 the following: Edward Willis and family, Charles Bottineau and family, Joseph Vizen and family, Antoine LaFere, Roseau Gorman, Charles Gladin and wife, James McCay and wife, Felix LaTrue and family, Pierre Bottineau and wife, Zail Georgie and family, P. Luyfer and wife, Miban Lama and family, Marcel Billenois and family, John Melich and family, Baptiste Shoutts and family, Oreis Laframbes and family, Francois Vion and family, Baptiste Shapois and family, Basil Ladoeur and family, Baptiste Bonvier and family, Marcel Surp and family, P. Lachotte and family, Daniel Olsen and family and Bedeaux DeLorme and family. At Pembina lived Antoine Geroux and family, Peter Hayden and family, Joseph Rolette and family, James McFetridge and family, H. S. Donaldson, William H. Moorhead, Joseph LeMay and Joseph Brebois. At Abercrombie and vicinity were Joseph Stone and family, Henry Meyers, Hiram Stone, William Daney, James Bennett, Mark Bridges and family and Harry Day. Robert Slember and Harry Block lived at the mouth of the Cheyenne. These were nearly all of the white male settlers in the valley. Of the leading mixed blood families at that time were the Grants, B. DeLorme, Antoine Conlan, Joseph Poleaux, B. Shorereman, P. Veneta, W. Laframbe, P. Wanton, A. Cocke, B. Lascurn, Antoine and Charles Sampeur, Michael and Antoine Gladin, Pierre and Zedore Crambeau, Joseph Amente, Joseph Zaunmia, Louis Belyand, John Angie, Paul Bouvier, Marcel Oliver, Antoine and Francois Billenois, James Frednia, Joseph, Baptiste and Isadore Fein, Louis Vion, Marcel Surp, Jr., Joseph Lachotte, Marcel Mattelle, Antoine Zangrous and A. Moesetts. These made their homes at St. Joseph. At Pembina and down the valley resided, of the mixed bloods: Francis Renville, Francis Renville, Jr., Narceni Grant, Charles Centernia, P. Picotte, F. Deaman, and F. Deaman, Jr., Francis Deshien, John, Francis and Joseph Coutier, Joseph Fredore, Joseph Dacolerts, A. Shorets, Baptiste Larocque, Baptiste Lataix, Louis and Antonius Lataix, Martin, Andre, David, Daniel, and Elio Jerome, Michael Henem, both senior and junior, Andrew Henem, Baptiste, Morgan and Joseph Smith, Baptiste Bremo, A. Lorene, B. Davis, Benjamin Menshaw, F. Persia, Joseph Larocque, Joseph Gadeon, A. Larocque, B. Laconte, N. Lacesar, A. Blue, Eustace Jordan, Baptiste Blue, Louis Swenia, Louis Robpeur. The local writer from whom these names have been gleaned, says of them: "There are manifestly errors in the spelling of some of the names, as the enumerator tried to follow the French sound without undertaking to follow the spelling. The list serves to show that many of the families now in the Turtle mountains are of American ancestry, though remotely connected with the old time Indian traders and hunters." A half breed by the name of Gingrass, about 1858, opened a store at St. Joseph, and in 1859 Charles Bottineau did the same. In 1860 W. H. Moorehead was appointed postmaster at St. Joseph now Walhalla, and occupied that office until 1864, when he was succeeded by John Hunt. In 1864, Mr. Moorhead on his removal from St. Joseph located on section 11, township 163 N., range 54 W., erecting a building which he occupied as residence, tavern, saloon and store. As at this time there were but three houses between Pembina and St. Joseph, and as this house was on the direct road from the latter place to Winnipeg, he had most excellent custom. A United States custom house was established at a point that was known for some years as Smuggler's Point.

In 1863 Mr. Canler, as already mentioned, returned to Pembina, and being commissioned postmaster, assumed the functions of that office. In 1864 Joseph Lannon located at that spot engaging in the retail liquor business. No more white settlers came to this place for several years.

In October, 1870, Judson LaMoire, who had made his residence at Elk Point, now in Union county, South Dakota, removed to Pembina. On the establishment of a United States district court at the latter point he was the first deputy United States marshal, and was also connected with the United States survey department. He was one of the first to extensively engage in farming, and for three years was deputy collector of customs. Mr. LaMoire for many years served in the territorial and state legislatures and was one of the prominent figures in the annals of the state.

In 1868 two men, Nicholas Hoffman and August Loon, who had been the old mail carriers on the Pembina-Abercrombie route, settled in what is now Grand Forks county, on the Red river.

In compliance with orders, Company I, Twentieth Infantry, under Capt. Lloyd Wheaton, on May 10, 1870, embarked on two flat boats, and floating with the current of the Red river, reached Pembina May 19. They went into camp at the confluence of the Red and Pembina rivers on the south bank of the latter. The next day Company K, of the same regiment, Capt. A. A. Harbach commanding, reached the same point. It seems that a board consisting of Col. George Sykes, of the Twentieth Infantry, and Capt. D. P. Heap, Engineer Corps, had been appointed to select a point for a new fort in this region, and had determined upon a site near St. Joseph, now Walhalla, twenty-nine miles west of Pembina, but this point not being approved by the powers that be, the captains named above and Captain S. T. Norvell had selected, under authority, a site for a fort at the confluence of the Red and Pembina rivers. The troops had come thither to build the new post, which they did.

May 19, 1870, Ole Strandwold, a representative type of the hardy Norse race, crossed the Red river and settled in what is now Cass county. He came here from Douglas county, Minnesota. J. M. Bender, who had come into the territory the previous fall, came north in the spring of 1870, with ox teams, and made a settlement about nine miles northwest of Fargo. P. McMahon located in the same neighborhood the same year. Morten, Lars and Paul Mortenson, typical Scandinavians, located the same year at the junction of the Cheyenne and the Red rivers. Warner Mattieson Satre, Olaf Hakans, Rustad Hakanson and C. O. Bye settled in what is now Cass county, also, in 1870. D. P. Harris, about the same time took up a claim on the west bank of the Red river and built a log cabin in which he passed the following winter. Peter Johnson was another settler of this year, locating about twenty miles south of the present site of Fargo.

In November, 1870, Andrew McHench came to the territory, and for a short time remained in the vicinity of Fort Abercrombie. April, 1871, he and his family and belongings came down the Red river in a skiff and took up their headquarters at the mouth of the Elm river. On the inception of the new city of Fargo, he removed thither. He was the first county superintendent of schools, and afterwards was a member of the territorial legislature.

In 1863 James J. Hill, now president of the Great Northern Railroad, made a visit to the Red river valley, by dog sleds, and upon his return to St. Paul sent Capt. Alexander Griggs to examine the river and to decide what kind of a boat would be necessary to build to control traffic. In 1870 Captain Griggs, who had removed to Fort Abercrombie, built a boat and floated down the river on an exploring expedition. On reaching the junction of the Red river and Red Lake river he drew his boat on shore, built a cabin and took up what was called a squatter's right. This he covered by a homestead entry later on. He returned to Fort Abercrombie and there he built the steamboat "Selkirk," which was launched April 23, 1871. Down the river it steamed, and for many years continued to ply the waters of that tortuous stream.

In the winter of 1869 some families of the name of Hicks, located near the present village of Hickson in Cass county. Among the other settlers of this year in that county were Charles Farrell and Charles Mow, who located on the Cheyenne river.

In 1871 agents of the Northern Pacific Railroad, whose engineers were fast approaching the Red river, sought a place on that stream where both banks being high the railroad could pass without the use of a draw bridge. Many people were convinced that at the point of crossing would spring up a town, which would, so they thought, be one of the great trade centers of the northwest. Several parties were watching closely the action of the railroad builders so that at the proper time they could locate, at least a part of a townsite. Among these were the Lake Superior and Puget Sound Land Company, a side issue of some of the leading spirits in the Northern Pacific Railroad. Others were Jacob Lowell, Jr., H. S. Back, and A. M. Hench. James Hales represented the land company here. Most of these people had spent the winter near the mouth of Elm river, thinking that that would be the crossing place. They waited in vain. Finally this idea was abandoned, and after several deceptive feints, the road displayed unmistakable signs of crossing at a point some miles below Fargo which has since become known as Bogusville. Those who had been eagerly watching for surveyors' stakes along the banks of the Elm, now abandoned the hopes they had centered in that locality, left their claims and moved up the river to Bogusville. Much time was consumed here and yet nothing decisive was done. Finally, on the evening of July 4, 1871, the engineers of the railroad made a rush for the site of the present city, and the Lake Superior & Puget Sound Land Company's men took possession of nearly every claim in the vicinity. The land company withdrew however, and the railroad company received title to section six, while section seven was divided among S. G. Roberts, A. J. Harwood, Patrick Devitt, Gordon J. Keeney and Harriet Young. The railroad company bought the claim on the opposite side of the river; the town of Moorhead was laid out, and the crossing located. There was no town platted on the west side of the river at that time, but the high price of lots on the east side drove many squatters over, and before winter, Fargo in the timber, as it was called, had a population of some two hundred or more inhabitants. The first merchant was Terrence Martin, who opened up a small store in a tent that same fall. It was discovered, however, that all the ground west of the river was in the Indian reservation, and this fact was used by the land company for all it was worth. All people on this land were trespassers, and efforts to oust them were made. Finally troops from Fort Abercrombie were called in and all except the employes of the railroad were ordered to withdraw. This mandate was never enforced, the government extinguishing the Indian title and throwing the reservation open to settlement. This was consummated in 1873.

In the meantime Peter P. Goodman, who had lived for several years on the east side of the river, and who had been through the region west of it, in 1871 crossed over and made a settlement just north of where Fargo now stands. The same year came Roderick D. Nelson, who took up a squatter's claim before the Indian title was extinguished. Two miles south of Fargo, on July 5, the same year, G. J. Keeney located a claim. He soon removed to the young city and was identified with A. J. Harwood, in the first newspaper in the Red river valley, the Fargo Express. C. A. Roberts located on a claim near Fargo, July, 1871, but soon removed to the rising village. Among the early settlers of the same year at the same place, was Schilstedt. His marriage with Miss Christina Torgarson, in February, 1872, was the first ceremony of the kind in Fargo. John E. Haggart came to the territory June 18, 1871, and August 8, following, took up a claim on the Cheyenne. T. Martin was another of the arrivals of this year.

In the meantime Walter Traill, agent of the Hudson's Bay Company, had established several stores on both sides of the Red river. One of these, put up in 1870, at Fargo Point (now Belmont), Traill county, was in charge of A. H. Morgan. In the spring of 1871 Sargent and Clark opened a store at Caledonia. George E. Weston, who had been in charge of the company's store at Georgetown, Minnesota, in April, 1870, crossed the river and took the first claim within the bounds of what is now Traill county. The following year brought a number of pioneers into this part of the territory, among whom were Carl Mergenthal, M. L. Gummer, Alvin Arnold, Christian Kaldor, Andrew Peterson, Stephen E. Randall, Ingebret Larson, Peter Paulson, Michael O'Flaherty, John Weller, Christian Olson, Anders Johnson, Rev. John Ostlund and others. Peter P. Goodman in 1871 made a settlement on a claim in what is now Cass county.

Among the others who came to what is now Cass county, in this year, 1871, were C. E. Petterson, M. L. McCormack, Jos. Greenwood, Halvor Beatru, Jas. Jenks, A. C. Kvello and A. H. Moore. The latter has the credit of erecting the first house on the town site of Fargo.

Ole J. Hertzgaard and Knud Iverson, who located on the Cheyenne in what is now Richland county, in April, 1871, are supposed to be the first to settle on that stream. About the same time Peter Trana settled in the same neighborhood. In the same county among the first settlers were M. T. Rich, after whom the county took its name, D. W. Smith, J. W. Blanding, J. Q. Burbank and W. E. Root.

In what is now Steele county, the first settler was probably Fingal Enger, who located there in 1872.

Settlers now began to flock into the Red river valley, so that towns, cities and villages sprang up on every hand, and farms both great and small, began to develop. The rapid growth of this part of the state can be best seen by a glance at the following enumeration of its population in 1880 by counties: Cass, 8,998; Cavalier, 6,471; Grand Forks, 6,248; Pembina, 4,862; Traill, 4,123; and Richland, 3,597. This makes a grand total in the valley of 34,299.

In the meantime, with the advent of railroads, came settlers to other parts of the state. Among the pioneers of what is now Barnes county, was D. D. McFadgen. He was a native of Argyleshire, Scotland, who came to Canada in boyhood. In 1870 he entered the employ of the Northern Pacific Railroad, then just in the process of construction. At the second crossing of the Cheyenne river he left the railroad crew, and at what is now Valley City, set up a tent, and with his partner, Richard McKinnon, opened a boarding house for the railroad hands. As the winter drew on the partners removed to the section house, just built, and continued their business. At the termination of his labors in this place Mr. McFadgen took up a claim and commenced farming. But few settlers came his way until 1877, when the tide of emigration that swept into North Dakota carried some thither. Mr. McFadgen was very prominent in his county and served as sheriff for many years.

The first settlers in Stutsman county, in the valley of the Dakota or James river, were Thomas Collins, J. B. Colby, J. F. Turner and Richard Blanchard. The two latter remained but a short time, but Messrs. Collins and Colby took up claims on the river. This was in November, 1871, and they spent the winter there. The next settler was A. W. Kelly. He came into the territory in July, 1864, with Major Clonney, of the Thirtieth Wisconsin Infantry, who brought a body of men to build Fort Wadsworth. In the following year he returned to St. Paul. In August, 1867, he located close to Fort Totten, at Devil's lake, where he erected a saw mill. This he operated from September 20, 1867, until the 23rd of the following December. In the spring he went to St. Paul from which he returned in a few months with a herd of cows. With these he started a dairy. In company with B. W. Smith and C. G. Lewis, he had a contract to furnish the government post both hay and cord wood. Indians and half breeds cut the wood, the women and squaws hauled it with ponies and in Red river carts. Mr. Kelley lived at Fort Totten until 1872, when he removed to Jamestown. While at the fort, in addition to his other business, he ran a store from 1868 to 1870. In 1872 he removed to what is now Stutsman county, taking a claim on section 26. The same year he started the first bakery in the new town which had sprung up on the Pipestem river. In November he opened one of the first stores in that part of the country, and continued in mercantile business until 1879. He was prominent in the organization of the county, and was chairman of its first board of commissioners.

Shortly after the arrival of Mr. Kelley George W. Vennum and Alexander McKechnie made their appearance in the same neighborhood and took up claims. About the same time that part of the future state secured accessions in the persons of H. C. Miller, P. Moran, Frank C. Myrick and others.

On the approach of the Northern Pacific Railroad to the James river, 1872, there sprang up on the west bank of that stream a tent village. Hill & Macnider are supposed to be the first to enter into mercantile transactions at that point. They afterwards removed to Bismarck. Clark & Bill and A. W. Kelley were also among the merchants. Vennum & McKechnie kept hotel in a large tent. In the autumn of the same year the railroad company established their depot on the east side of the river and the business and all of the village removed to that side. The failure of Jay Cooke and the subsequent embarrassment of the railroad militated against the growth of the town for some years. The first building put up in the city of Jamestown, on its present site, was erected by Miller. J. W. Goodrich was also a settler of 1872 in the rising village.

William H. Mercer, a native of Center county, Pennsylvania, came to the Missouri river, in what is now Burleigh county, in October, 1869, and engaged in hunting and trapping. About the same time Joseph H. Taylor, who was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, came to the neighborhood of what was known as the Painted woods, near where the village of that name now stands. He also spent the winter in hunting, fishing and trapping. He had come to the territory in 1865 and had published the Dakota Democrat, at Yankton, for a few months. Some others, among them Joseph Miller and Henry Suttle, were living along the banks of the "Big Muddy" engaged in cutting fire wood to sell to the steamboats that plied those waters. In the spring of 1872, with others who came to this part of the territory, was Joseph Dietrich, who had come into the territory in 1869 and had hunted, fished and trapped through this region. He found a home in what is now Burleigh county, and for a year held down the townsite of Burleigh City. He was a native of New York, born November 30, 1846, but reared in Wisconsin. He has remarked that of the eleven men who had come into Dakota with him eight had been killed by the Indians. In May, 1872, Samuel Townsend made the first entry of land in this portion of the state, filing upon a quarter-section now within the city limits of the city of Bismarck. H. P. Bogue located on a claim in Burleigh county about the same time.

In May, 1872, a party consisting of George W. Sweet, attorney for the Lake Superior & Puget Sound Land Company., Thomas H. Canfield, one of the directors of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, General Rosser, chief engineer of that road, William Woods, John J. Jackman and E. H. Bly made a trip from Fargo to the bank of the Missouri river for the purpose of deciding upon the site of a town upon the shores of that stream. To this it was intended to give the name of Edwinton. Mr. Jackman kept close watch and foreseeing the point that would be chosen for the railroad to cross the "Big Muddy," in company with Col. John H. Richards, Major William Woods, George Sandborn and others filed upon the land adjacent to the river. By thus doing they forced the land company back upon sections 3, 4 and 33, upon which the city was originally laid out. Mr. Jackman was a native of Massachusetts who had located at St. Paul the previous year. He was one of the pioneer farmers of Burleigh county and raised the first wheat and oats in that sub-division of the state of North Dakota.

In 1872 it became obvious to the management of the land company that foreign capital must be induced to take hold of the enterprise. As a complimentary overture to Germany, the name of this new town site was changed to Bismarck, in honor of Prince Otto Von Bismarck, the German chancellor. A map of the road was sent to Germany, and the Prince responded to the high honor paid him, in an autograph letter which is now among the choicest treasures of the company in its archives at New York.

The original settlement of the town was a complication of conflicts, from the day Col. Sweet and his party arrived to found the town of Edwinton, until Edmund Hackett was declared mayor of Bismarck, five years later. Disappointed in his original intention, which was to locate the town on the river bank, Col. Sweet fell back a mile and secured sections 4 and 33. Then the struggle was renewed. Claims were filed by the party, headed by Col. Sweet, and counter-claims by the party represented by J. J. Jackman. Outside parties, deeming their rights equal to any yet presented, also settled, and when the time came for proving up, contests were so plenty and the contestants' claims so evenly balanced that a compromise was effected upon this basis: The town was laid out by J. E. Turner, an engineer in charge of the townsite work of the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and the territorial legislature then gave a deed in trust to Edmund Hackett, whom it appointed mayor of the newly chartered city of Bismarck. Under this trust deed Mr. Hackett was to apportion the lots among the original settlers in the following amounts: Edmund Hackett, $800 in money and two blocks of lots; J. W. Proctor, two blocks of lots, and each citizen who had made any improvement on his lot, the lot occupied by him, upon payment of a nominal valuation of from $10 to $15. This compromise was fully effected and title given to the land until 1877.

The upbuilding of a western city, almost without exception, commences with a canvas tent, which is occupied as a saloon. In this Bismarck started on one higher step—her first building was a tent, but it was occupied as a store.

In May, 1872, W. B. Shaw, of the firm of Shaw & Cathcart, arrived in Bismarck and opened a general merchandise store in a tent between Third and Fourth streets. They were, however, followed in a day or two by a saloon, which was built by James A. Emmons. Shortly afterward, R. R. Marsh built the Capital hotel. This was quite a pretentious building for that day and age, it being one hundred and forty feet long by twenty-two wide, and two stories in height. Following these, buildings and tents were rapidly erected, until the little frontier settlement presented a busy aspect. In its early day Bismarck's reputation for morality was below par. Its close proximity to the land of the roving, free-hearted, dare-devil cow-boy made it a popular resort for that class of western citizens, and the usual reign of lawlessness prevailed. Gambling and dissipation led to quarrels that were often settled by the bullet. All this in time passed away and the infant city grew, and as it increased in age and size the roughest element went on westward and peace and order became the rule. Thus Bismarck took her place in the ranks of the orderly cities of the state, and to-day is one of the best in the young state.

But why go on; after the revival of business that suffered in that direful crisis of the year 1873, the tide of emigration poured into North Dakota and the country fast filled up. New settlements were formed, new communities founded and new farms and ranches opened. The population of the northern part of Dakota rapidly increased, and at the time of the division of the territory and the admission of North Dakota into the ranks of the glorious sisterhood of states that make up our noble country it had a population of over 175,000.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SIOUX MASSACRE OF 1862.

The terrible uprising of the Dacotah Indians in the summer of 1862, and consequent death of seven or eight hundred defenseless settlers of Minnesota and the Dakotas, furnishes one of the dark spots in our later day history. Reaching from the Iowa line north to the international boundary line, and from the central part of Minnesota west as far as the white settlers could be found, massacre and devastation spread. All in the northwest, north of the state of Iowa, were involved. This extended area had a population at that time exceeding fifty thousand, all engaged in laying the foundations of their fortunes and the growth, development and prosperity of their states. The causes which led to this outbreak were complicated, and considerable difference of opinion exists to-day as to what was the real reason of the apparently unprovoked onslaught upon a defenseless people.

To go back to the first cause, it may be said that by the treaty of Traverse des Sioux, July 23, 1851, between the United States and the Sissitons or Sissitons and the Wahpetonwans, $275,000 were to be paid their chiefs and the further sum of $30,000 was to be expended for the tribes' benefit in Indian improvements. By the treaty of Mendota, dated August 5, of the same year, the M'dewakantonwan and the Wahpekutewan Sioux were to receive the sum of $200,000, to be paid to their chiefs and for an improvement fund of $30,000. These several sums, amounting in all to $555,000, these Indians claimed was never paid except in some trifling sums expended in improvements on the reservation. Thievery was then rife among the Indian agents and political employes of the Indian bureau, and no doubt there was much that was true in these claims of the savages. The Indians grew more and more dissatisfied and freely expressed themselves in council and to the agents. In 1867 the Indian department at Washington sent out Major Kintzing Prichette, a man of large experience and unsullied integrity, to investigate the cause of the ill feeling. In his report, made to the department the same year, the Major says: "The complaint that runs through all their councils points to the imperfect performance or non-fulfilment of treaty stipulations. Whether these are well or ill founded it is not my premise to discuss. That such a belief prevails among them, impairing their confidence and good faith in the government, cannot be questioned."

In one of these councils, Jagmani, a chief, said: "The Indians sold their lands at Traverse des

Sioux. I say what we are told. For fifty years they were to be paid $50,000 each year. We were, also, promised $30,000, and that we have not seen." Another chief said that the treaty of Traverse des Sioux $275,000 were to be paid to them when they came upon their reservation; they desired to know what had become of it. Every white man knows that they have been five years upon their reservation, and yet we have heard nothing of it."

As the fact of this dissatisfaction existed so plainly, the government was forced to appoint Judge Young to investigate the charges that had been brought against Alexander Ramsey, then governor of the territory of Minnesota, who was then acting, ex-officio, as superintendent of Indian affairs for that locality.

In making a report upon the matter, later, Judge Young makes the following statement:

"The governor is next charged with having paid over the greater part of the money, appropriated under the fourth article of the treaty of July 23 and August 5, 1851, to one Hugh Tyler, for payment or distribution to the traders and half-breeds, contrary to the wishes and remonstrances of the Indians, and in violation of law and the stipulations contained in the treaties; and also in violation of his own solemn pledges, personally made to them in regard to said payments.

"Of $275,000 stipulated to be paid under the first clause of the fourth article of the treaty of Traverse des Sioux, of July 24, 1851, the sum of $250,000 was delivered over to Hugh Tyler, by the governor, for distribution among the traders and half-breeds, according to the arrangement made by the schedule of the Traders' Paper, dated at Traverse des Sioux, July 23, 1851."

More to the same effect was reported, but the concluding words of the report are significant:

"This (the payment to traders and others not the Indians) has been shown to have been contrary to the wishes and remonstrances of a large majority of the Indians. It is, also, in violation of the treaty stipulations and the law making the appropriation under them."

These several sums of money were to be paid to these Indians in open council, and soon after they were on their reservation provided for them by the treaties. In these matters the report shows they were not consulted at all, in open council; but on the contrary, that arbitrary divisions and distributions were made of the entire fund, and their right denied to direct the manner in which they should be appropriated. The money had evidently disappeared between the government treasury and the Indians. It was also stated in the report that this Hugh Tyler had deducted the large sum of $55,000 as brokerage, and those of the traders and half-breeds who objected were told that they could take what was offered them or they would get nothing. The senate of the United States examined these charges, but, for political reasons, the charges were not sustained. Naturally the Indians were not satisfied with their treatment by the accredited agents of the government, and this rankled in their breasts.

Another cause for irritation among these Indians grew out of the massacre of 1857 at Spirit Lake, Iowa. Inkpaduta, Scarlet Point, was an outlaw of the Wapakuta, who had been driven from his tribe for the murder of one of their number, and led a roving life around the headwaters of the Des Moines river. He had gradually gathered around him a little band as bad as himself, and they were in trouble nearly all the time, either with red or white men. At that time there was a small settlement at Okiboji, or Spirit Lake, Iowa, and in that vicinity did these desperadoes hang out all the winter of 1856-7. Inkpaduta was connected with several bands of Ammuty Sioux and similar relations with other bands existed among his followers, these ties extending even to the Ihankannas or Yanktonnais, west of the James, and even to the Missouri river. The settlers became tired of the depredations of the band and finally, finding themselves strong enough, took their arms away from the Indians. Getting other guns, they returned to the settlement at Spirit Lake and massacred nearly all the people thereabouts, numbering about forty, and carried off as captive four women, two of whom they afterward killed and the other two were rescued after a time through the aid of friendly Indians. The government required that the Sioux deliver up to them for punishment these outlaws, and, to enforce the demands, withheld the annuity. Considerable opposition was manifested, and bad blood over this, so in a sullen fit Little Crow pursued Inkpaduta and his followers with a number of Indians, and in an engagement killed three of the band, wounded another and took prisoners two women and a child. They then returned home, saying that they had done enough. The government, although otherwise advised, condoned the matter and paid the annuity due, without insisting upon the surrender of the whole band. Thus Inkpaduta escaped the punishment which he richly deserved.

The action of the government in resuming the payment of the annuity after having said they would not until the band of outlaws were delivered up, was construed by the Indians as cowardice, or weakness. The result was that the Indians grew more insolent and unmanageable than ever. Their leaders here found the capital out of which they could manufacture the tales at council fires and stir up the bad impulses of naturally savage instincts. Little Crow, a prominent chief, was a deeper thinker than his tribesmen. In fact, as one writer phrases it, "He was the Napoleon of his people. For deep cunning and unusual foresight, he takes a front rank among the noted Indian leaders of this country. With the patience of his race, he now laid a deep scheme for the extermination of the entire white race west of the Mississippi."

Major Galbraith, Sioux agent at the time, says, after enumerating various causes that helped to swell the enmity in the bosom of the savages, "that they (the Indians) knew that the government was at war, and seeing the illustrated papers at all the posts and trading places, could see that the tide of battle was setting against the 'Great Father.'"

The Major further adds:

"Grievances such as have been related, and numberless others akin to them, were spoken of, recited and chanted at their councils, dances and feasts, to such an extent that, in their excitement, in June, 1862, a secret organization known as the 'Soldiers' Lodge,' was founded by the young braves of the Lower Sioux, with the object, as far as I was able to learn through spies and informers, of preventing the traders from going to the pay-table, as had been their custom. Since the outbreak I have become satisfied that the real object of this lodge was to adopt measures to clean out all the white people at the end of the payment."

In this Soldiers' Lodge, then at the Yellow Medicine agency, near Mankato, Minnesota, in the brain of a savage, was concocted a scheme for the utter extermination of the intruding race, that for diplomacy, forecast and judgment were worthy of a Napoleon or Toussaint L'Overture. He felt that only acting as a whole could the Indians accomplish all they wished, and holding back his own particular followers, without allowing their zeal to cool, Little Crow made overtures to the surrounding bands of Sioux even "as far north as Leech lake, and it is believed made efforts to enlist in his scheme the hereditary enemies of the Sioux, the Chippewas." "Let us wait," he said, "until the white men have gathered in all their crops and have laid in their winter stores, then we will kill them all and have their property." Since the confederacy, presided over by Tecumseh and the Prophet, never has there been so well laid a plot against the white people. And all the time the settlers, with their eyes closed to the danger, never dreamed of the devilish scheme of this red skingeneral and diplomat. The plot was for a simultaneous rising of the Indians upon a given signal, and was to result in a total wiping out of the settlers, and, but for the impatience and hasty action of a few irresponsible braves, the loss of life would have been thousands instead of hundreds.

One lovely Sunday, August 17, 1862, four Indians from the Yellow Medicine agency, who had been on the trail of a Chippewa, the murderer of one of their tribe, after an unsuccessful pursuit, reached, on their return, the cabin of a man by the name of Robinson Jones, in the Big Woods of Minnesota, in what is now the town of Acton, Meeker county. This man was a sort of trader in a small way, and is supposed to have carried on an illicit trade in liquors with the Indians. His family consisted of himself, wife, an adopted child and a young girl. The Indians sauntered up to the cabin and, after some palaver, demanded drink, which they obtained. They demanded more, which they, it is supposed, were, for some reason, refused, and finally went away into the leafy shades of the forest that surrounded the place. Jones and his wife shortly after left for the house of Mrs. Jones' son by a former marriage, Howard Baker, who lived about half a mile distant. At Baker's cabin they found one Viranus Webster and his wife. These young people were journeying further west in search of a home, and had stopped to rest. Claiming hospitality of the young Mr. Baker, it was accorded with free will, and the two families fraternized in the true spirit of the western pioneer. Shortly after Jones and his wife arrived there, the men folks, who were sitting around outside the house, saw three Indians, gun in hand, approach. On their coming up to the little group of white men the usual salutations took place. After a little time the proposition was made that they all shoot at a mark, and the guns of the party were brought out. The victory in this case, as is nearly always the case when marksmanship between whites and redskins is a question, was with the settlers. This seemed to nettle the Indians. Propositions to trade guns between a red and white man now ensued. In the meantime the Indians loaded their guns while the white men stood around with empty weapons. Suddenly, without warning, one of the Indians raised his gun and fired at Jones, mortally wounding him. Webster was killed by another. Mrs. Howard Baker, hearing the firing, came to the door with her infant in her arms, and upon her appearance one of the savages raised his gun to shoot her, but her husband, with the chivalry of a knight of old, threw himself in front of the rifle, and, receiving the discharge, fell dead. The women retreated into the house. The young wife, inadvertently, stepped into an opening and fell into the cellar and thus saved her life. Mrs. Jones was also shot by one of the red fiends. These latter soon left the vicinity to spread the news, stopping on their way at the Jones cabin and killing the girl left there. They shortly after stole a team of horses and wagon and made their way south.

When the news reached the red skins at the agency, which it did long before the whites had an inkling of it, it created a sensation. The gauntlet had been thrown, war had been declared, and they must go forward or give up their plans. The Soldiers' Lodge was at once convened. The war spirit of the younger members was for an immediate rising. In vain Little Crow and his friends, the elders of the tribes, plead for delay, urging the want of time to perfect their plans, and to send the token of war to the other tribes. No, war and at once was the wish of the majority, and war it was. At early dawn the meeting broke up and the massacre of the whites began. At the agency blood was shed and all the red fiends started off on the warpath to slay the whites.

The story of the massacre has been written time and time again and by abler hands, and need not be here retold, except as to its connection with the annals of what is now the promising state of North Dakota. Fortunately, the tide of emigration had not reached this part of the country to any great extent, and hence the loss of life among the settlers was not very great.

Fort Abercrombie, which was the protector of the valley of the Red river of the North, was first built in 1858, but after being held but a short time was abandoned and the property sold. In July, 1860, the necessity for a post in that vicinity having grown greater, Major Day came to that point with a detachment of troops and rebuilt the fort.

This was situated upon the west bank of the Red river, in what is now Richland county, about fifteen miles north of the present site of the city of Wahpeton. For a year Major Day with two companies of regulars occupied the post. In July, 1861, he, with his command, was ordered to Washington, D. C., and was succeeded by a Captain Markham with two companies of regular troops. These were withdrawn by the exigencies of the Civil war, then raging, and were succeeded by Captain Inman with some companies of the Fourth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry. On these troops leaving for the front during the war with the South, they were succeeded by Captain John Van der Horck, with one or two companies of the Fifth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry. These were at the post when the massacre broke out. The fort was kept up until 1877, when it was abandoned, and the following year the buildings were sold and scattered among the early settlers of that region, who built houses and barns of the material. The various officers who filled the position of post commander at this fort from the time of its first upbuilding until its final abandonment by the government were the following named:

General Abercrombie, Major Day, Captain Markham, Captain Inman, Captain Van der Horck, Captain Burger, Captain Pettler, Major Camp, Captain Chamberlain, General C. P. Adams, Captain Whitcomb, Major Hall and General Sliell.

On the 23d of August, 1862, the Indians commenced hostilities in the valley of the Red river of the North. But part of the little garrison was at the fort at the time, a part of the command being stationed at Georgetown, Minnesota, and the east bank of the river, fifty miles north. They had been sent there for the purpose of overawing the Indians in that vicinity, who had threatened some obstruction of the navigation of the stream and to destroy the property of the Transportation Company. The interpreter at the post, who had gone to the Lower agency at the time of the payment of the Indians, returned on the 20th of August and reported to his commanding officer that the exasperation of the Indians was increasing and that he expected hostilities to be commenced in the near future. Action was at once taken to guard against a surprise; guards were doubled and every effort made to put the little post in proper shape for defense. About this time officers of the government were on their way with a train of some thirty wagons, loaded with goods and attended by about two hundred head of cattle, toward the lodge of the Red Lake Chippewas, to conclude a treaty with these tribes. They had arrived, about this time, in the neighborhood of the fort.

On the morning of the 23d of August word was brought to the commander of the post that a band of five hundred Sioux had crossed the Otter tail river with the intention of cutting off and capturing the train and cattle. Word was sent at once to the train to come into the fort, which they quickly did. Messengers were also sent to Breckenridge, Old Crossing, Graham's Point and all the principal settlements telling the people to flee to the fort, as the garrison was too small to do much else than defend that post and could not afford protection to the scattered villages or settlers in the vicinity. The great majority of the settlers paid heed to the warning and the same evening the most of them had arrived at the fort and had been assigned such quarters as could be furnished them. Most, if not all, of these, dwelt upon the east side of the river, in Minnesota, as but few settlers had then located on the west side, south of Pembina, as is shown elsewhere.

Several men, among them being a Mr. Russell, however, preferred to stay at Breckenridge, and took possession of a large hotel building and therein undertook to defend themselves and their property, but foolishly threw away their lives in the attempt.

On the evening of the same day a scouting party of six men moved over in the direction of Breckenridge from the fort and found that the place was in the hands of a large body of Indians. The little party were seen and pursued, but being mounted, while the Indians were afoot, they escaped.

The detachment that had been stationed at Georgetown was ordered to rejoin at once. On the 24th a reconnaissance was made toward Breckenridge by a detachment, and the place was found deserted by the Indians. The bodies of the three men who had undertaken its defense were discovered, horribly mutilated. When found chains were bound upon their ankles by which they had been dragged around until life had fled. An old settler in the neighborhood, Nick Huffman, who was in the fort at the time, in speaking of this expedition, says:

"While the boys were engaged in burying the remains they thought they could see an Indian in the sawmill, so Rounseval, a half-breed, went to see if that was the case. The mill was half a mile away. He found an old lady by the name of Scott who had been living with her son. Her son was killed and her grandson taken prisoner. She had a bullet wound in her breast and had crawled on her hands and knees sixteen miles to the mill. She also told the boys where they would find the body of Joe Snell, a stage driver, three miles out from Breckenridge. They buried the body of Snell and took the old lady to the fort. On the way in the Indians attacked them and killed the teamster, named Bennett, and came very near taking Captain Mull's wagon containing the old lady. But Rounseval made a charge and brought back the team, the old lady and the body of Bennett. They buried Scott the next day."

The mail taken in the stage coach, spoken of above, was taken from the sacks and scattered about the prairies, but much of it was gathered up by the detachment, which was under the command of Judge McCauley.

Over fifty men capable of bearing arms had taken refuge with the garrison and willingly played the part of soldiers. Unfortunately, many of them were destitute of arms, and the post commander had none to spare, so the men helped strengthen the position by building outside intrenchments. Says an eye witness: "The fort was hard to fortify. There was a stockade along the river. The headquarters and barracks for one company were on the prairie. We fortified the company quarters, using the barrels of pork and corned beef and flour in part for this purpose, with cordwood and earth. The women and children and the sick, and the picket guards, also, had special provision made for them."

"About this time some thousand or fifteen hundred infuriated savages had gathered around the fort, fully determined to capture the place and carry off the stores. On the 25th of August a messenger was dispatched to headquarters stating the circumstances under which the post found itself and the danger of a severe attack. Owing to the stress of war at the south, most of the young, vigorous and able-bodied men of Minnesota and Iowa were away at the front. It was impossible to relieve the fort for some time, although steps looking to that event were at once placed in train. The garrison watched closely for the cunning advances of the Sioux and by sleepless vigil balked their wily foes." On the 27th of the month a party went out from the fort and buried several more bodies of murdered settlers. On Saturday, August 30, a small party set out with the intention of proceeding to Old Crossing to reconnoiter and to collect and drive to the fort such live stock as they could find. After proceeding about ten miles they came upon a party of Sioux in ambush, who fired upon them. One of the party was killed, but the rest escaped to the post with the loss of their wagon, five mules and camp equipage.

At two o'clock the same afternoon Indians in large numbers displayed themselves to the sight of those within the beleaguered fort. At that time most of the stock belonging to the post, as well as that belonging to the settlers who had taken refuge therein, together with the cattle intended for the Chippewas, with whom the government was about to make a treaty, were all grazing upon the prairie in the rear of the fort over a range extending from one-half a mile to three miles from it. Much to the mortification of both the soldiers and the citizens, the Indians boldly advanced and drove off the larger part of the stock, the little garrison not being strong enough to move out and drive the savages off and at the same time defend the fort. The Indians got about two hundred head of cattle and a hundred horses and mules. They made no demonstration toward the garrison, except by this bold defiance. On the second of September another party went out from the fort, in the direction of Breckenridge, but returned in the afternoon, having seen no Indians, but picking up about fifty head of the cattle driven off by the Indians, which they had found wandering about on the prairie.

At daybreak on the following morning, September 23, the garrison was suddenly called to arms by the report of alarm shots fired by the sentinels in the vicinity of the stock yards belonging to the post. The firing soon became sharp and rapid in that direction, developing the fact that the enemy were advancing upon that point in considerable force. Commands were issued for all those stationed outside to fall back within the fortifications. About the same time a couple of the haystacks were discovered to be on fire. The settlers, emboldened by the sight and inflamed by the thoughts of seeing their remaining cattle carried off or destroyed before their eyes, rushed, with great hardihood and ardor for the stables, and as the first two entered on one side two Sioux entered from the other. The foremost of the white men killed one of the Indians and captured his gun. The second white man was shot in the shoulder by his red antagonist, but notwithstanding that shot the Sioux and finished him with his bayonet. Two horses had been taken from the stable and two killed. The conflict was kept up for three hours, during which three of the little garrison were wounded, one mortally, by shots from the enemy. The post commander was severely wounded in the right arm by an accidental shot from one of his own men. After a brisk skirmish the Indians were forced to retire, without having been able to effect an entrance into the fort or to carry off the stock, which seemed to be the main object of the attack. Active measures were taken to strengthen the outworks of the fort. The principal materials at hand were cordwood and hewn timber, of which there was a great store, and Napoleon once said, "with wood in plenty and earth men can intrench and fortify themselves well, anywhere." A breast work was built around the barracks. This was constructed with cordwood, well filled in with earth, and raised to a height of eight feet. This was capped by hewn timbers, eight inches square, with loop holes between them from which a fire could be opened on the approaching foe. This was designed as a keep or means of a final rallying place and harbor of protection in case the outer works were forced or the main fort destroyed by fire.

A second attack was made on Saturday, September 6. About dawn, the Indians' favorite time for an onslaught, about fifty Indians, mounted on horseback, appeared on the open prairie, in the rear of the fort. It was evidently their intention, by boldly defying the garrison in this manner, with a small force, to tempt the troops to leave the fortification and march out to punish them for their temerity. By thus doing it would be giving the redskins the chance to take them at a disadvantage. Foiled in this plan, for there were shrewd and experienced heads within the fort who were a match for the Indian craft outside, the Sioux threw off all disguise and, displaying themselves in large numbers in different directions, entered upon a conflict. Their principal object of attack in this, as in former instances, was the stables of the government. They seemed to be possessed with the idea of getting hold of the remaining horses and cattle at almost any sacrifice.

The stables were upon the edge of the prairie, with a grove of heavy timber lying between them and the river. The Sioux were quick to grasp the advantage of making their approach from the latter direction. The shores of the river on both side were lined with Indians for a considerable distance, as their war-whoops, when their preparations for the attack were concluded, soon gave evidence. They were determined, if possible, to frighten the garrison into cowardly inactivity, or to drive them from their outposts by their unearthly whoops and yells, which they indulged in to a large extent. They, in return, however, were saluted, surprised and partially quieted by the opening upon them of a six-pounder and the sharp explosion of a shell in their midst. A large force was now led by one of their principal chiefs from the river through the timber until they were as close to the stables as they could go without quitting the shelter and protection of the big trees. In vain their chief tried to get them to make a rush, but the Indian nature recoiled from exposing themselves in the intervening opening space. Again and again their leader tried to induce them to charge for the tempting stables. Once a part of the band advanced to storm the place, but were met with a withering volley. This seemed to take all desire to advance in that direction out of them and they rapidly fled back to the timber, each seeking a big tree to protect himself from the searching fire.

An anecdote is told in this connection that probably should be retold here, as showing the manner in which the fight was continued. Walter P. Hills, a citizen, who had distinguished himself several times by riding through the Indian lines with dispatches either to the headquarters or from the latter to the fort, was the hero. It seems that he had but just returned to the post with dispatches the evening before. He took part in the engagement and killed an Indian in the early portion of the fight. Taking up a position at one of the loopholes of the fort, he soon found a particular antagonist in a brawny Sioux, who had posted himself behind a convenient tree. Mr. Hills, being somewhat acquainted with the language of his opponent, saluted him, and they conversed back and forth, each taking a shot at the other whenever the chance came. For over an hour they kept this up. The Indian, in changing his position so as to fire from the other side of the tree, hastily exposed his person. It was but a fleeting moment, but a party in the upper bastion observed it and the sharp crack of a rifle was heard from that direction. The Indian started backward and two other shots rang out, and the polite antagonist of Mr. Hills lay stretched upon the earth, dead. That gentleman, it is added, felt much dissatisfaction and annoyance that any but his hand had sped the bullet that had found his enemy's life.

Several of the enemy were shot as they skulked through the timber, from tree to tree. The artillery, most dreaded by the Indian, did effective service. A body of horsemen gathered on a knoll on the prairie, about half a mile away, and it was suspected that they had collected in order to make a charge. A small gun was brought to bear upon the group. A shell hissed and shrieked through the air, plumped itself down in the middle of the horsemen and the explosion was followed by the immediate disappearance of the whole troop.

The desultory combat lasted until nearly noon, when the savage foe sullenly withdrew, carrying off nearly all his dead and wounded. Their loss was never ascertained, but from various sources it is believed to have been quite heavy. Our loss was one man killed, two wounded. Mr. Hills left the fort the same evening with despatches for headquarters at St. Paul, where he arrived September 8.

About this time, at St. Paul, efforts were being instituted for the relief of the fort. Captain Emil Buerger was appointed by special order from headquarters to organize and take command of an expedition with that end in view. This brave and gallant officer, a native of Prussia, had served in the army of his native land for a period of some ten years. On coming to Minnesota he became a naturalized citizen. He enlisted in the Second Company of Minnesota Sharpshooters, and was wounded and taken prisoner at the hard-fought field of Fair Oaks, Virginia, in the spring of 1862. Being paroled, he was sent to Benton barracks, Missouri, and was there at the time the ill-fated Minnesota Third Volunteer Infantry was ordered home. That body of men being entirely without officers, Captain Buerger was appointed to take charge of it from St. Louis to St. Paul. His known experience and bravery pointing him out as the fit commander, he was selected to lead the expedition then fitting out for the relief of Fort Abercrombie.

On the 9th of September he was informed by the commandant at Fort Snelling that the companies commanded by Captains George Atkinson and Rolla Banks, together with some sixty men from the Third Volunteer Infantry, under Sergeant Dearborne, were to constitute his command. This made up an aggregate force of about two hundred and fifty men. The next day arms and equipments were served out, and before noon, September 11, Captain Atkinson's company and the company formed from the members of the Third regiment, were ready for the march. With these Captain Buerger set out, leaving Captain Banks' company to follow as soon as they had received their clothing and equipments. The latter joined the main column the next day. It was deemed expedient to send with this force the only remaining field piece belonging to the state, and Lieutenant R. J. McHenry was appointed to the command of the battery and succeeded in reaching Captain Buerger's force September 13, near Clearwater. Muddy roads, rain, lack of transportation and other causes delayed the column. The fitting out of so many other expeditions and detachments at the same time had drawn so heavily upon a sparsely settled country that scarcely a horse or wagon could be had either by contract or by impressment. In the meantime two companies of soldiers, under Captains George W. McCoy and Theodore H. Barrett, were also marching to the relief of Fort Abercrombie. They had gone to various points in the state of Minnesota that were threatened by the Indians, and rendered excellent service. The time had now come for them to resume their march for the point of their original destination. During the night of September 15, while in camp near Lake Amelia, on the old Red river trail, they were overtaken by a courier with orders to join Captain Buerger's column and place themselves under his command. On the 19th they accordingly made the junction with the other column. By this accession the force at the disposal of the commander was increased to over four hundred<sup>1</sup> men. The line of march was now taken, and after an uneventful journey of several days the column reached Old Crossing, on the Otter Trail river, between Dayton and Breckenridge, about fifteen miles from the latter place. This was on the 23rd of September. The next morning the march was resumed, and all were in expectation. Nothing occurred until the expedition had reached a point about a mile from the Red river, and almost within sight of Fort Abercrombie. A dense smoke was observed in the direction of the fort. The impression was that they had arrived too late, and that the fort had fallen beneath the attacks of the redskins, and that it was being reduced by fire, the Indians' favorite weapon in war. All hastened to an eminence, when the sight of Old Glory still waving above the still standing battlements of the post cheered their hearts and brightened their eyes. The Indians, who were well posted upon the march of the expedition, had set fire to the prairie between the command and the post, with the design of cutting off the crossing of the river by the relieving column. On the resumption of the march, as they still approached nearer the river, a band of some thirteen savages appeared upon the opposite shore, who discharged their rifles at the marching troops, at a distance of fifteen hundred yards, without effect, and hastily and in great fear fled into the bushes. A detachment, consisting of twenty mounted men of Captain Freeman's company and twenty skirmishers from the Third Regiment company, all under the command of Lieutenant Taylor, was directed to cross the river as quickly as possible. Fired by the sights they had seen in their arduous march and service, the soldiers entered upon this duty with an alacrity that boded ill for any Sioux they encountered. They crossed the river and followed in the direction taken by the Indians they had seen. Captain Buerger took the balance of the Third Regiment and the field piece to a point above where he thought the Indians would cross in their retreat. Finding, however, that the Sioux were retreating, under cover of the woods, across the prairie, in the direction of the Wild Rice river, he ordered the whole force to cross the Red river. This was effected in less than an hour, the men not waiting to be carried over in wagons, but, with the true spirit of the American soldier, plunged into the river, there breast deep, and waded across. By this time the Indians had retreated some three miles, and had reached the heavy timber which skirted the prairie. Pursuit was considered useless, and the line of march was resumed for the fort. About four o'clock in the afternoon of that September day they reached the post to the great joy of the garrison and the citizens therein beleaguered. They were received with cheers and every demonstration of delight and enthusiasm. When the moving column of troops had been first descried from the ramparts of the fort they had been taken for Indian reinforcements advancing to the attack, and all was excitement. The reaction when it was discovered that it was the long-expected, long-delayed relief column, was the greater for their few minutes of alarm. Charles S. Bryant, in his history of the Minnesota Massacre, gives the description of the scene of these last moments of the siege in the words of an eye-witness, a lady who had been cooped up in the fort for those perilous weeks, waiting for coming of relief. The account says:

"About five o'clock the report came to quarters that the Indians were again coming from up toward Bridge's. With a telescope we soon discovered four white men, our messengers riding at full speed, who upon reaching here informed us that in one-half hour we would be reinforced by three hundred and fifty men. Language can never express the delight of all. Some wept, some laughed, others hollered and cheered. The soldiers and citizens here formed in line and went out to meet them. We all cheered so that the next day more than half of us could hardly speak aloud. The ladies all went out, and as the soldiers passed cheered them. They were so dusty I did not know one of them."

That same morning, but at an early hour, a messenger was despatched again with a more urgent call for help. The gates of the fort opened and the messenger, Walter Hills, mounted upon a fleet horse and escorted by some thirty-two volunteers, partly soldiers, partly citizens, emerged. The Indians were in ambush all around, and, every moment the little band expected to hear the deadly crack of the rifle and see the fall of some comrade or receive himself, the fatal missile. For some unaccountable reason, however, the savages withheld their fire and the party rode on and crossed the river, and the messenger was soon riding eastward for succor. The escort turned toward the fort, but about a mile from the post fell into an ambush of the Indians and lost two of their number. One of these was a settler named Edward Wright, and a soldier by the name of Shuly. The rest fled for the fort and by extraordinary exertion escaped and reached the garrison.

The next morning about two-thirds of the mounted company under command of Captain Freeman, escorted by a strong force of infantry, went out to search for the bodies of those slain the day before. After scouring the woods for a considerable distance the bodies were found upon the prairie about eighty rods apart, mangled and mutilated to such a degree as to be almost deprived of human shape. The body of Mr. Wright had been ripped open from the center of the abdomen to the throat. The heart and liver were entirely removed, while the lungs were torn out and left upon the outside of the chest. The head was cut off, scalped, and thrust within the cavity of the abdomen with the face toward the feet. The hands were cut off and laid side by side with the palms downward a short distance from the body. The body of Shuly had been pierced by two balls, one of which must have occasioned instant death. When found, it was lying upon the face, with the upper part of the head completely smashed and beaten in with clubs, while the brains were scattered around upon the grass. It showed eighteen bayonet wounds in the back and one of the legs had received a gash to the bone, extending the whole length of the upper half. Mr. Wright had lived in the neighborhood for years. The Indians had been in the habit of visiting his father's house, sharing the hospitalities of the dwelling and receiving alms of the family. He was well known to those who so cruelly mangled his lifeless form, who could have nothing against him except that he was of the hated white race. That his body had been treated with greater indignity than that of the soldier was in accord with the feelings expressed to some of the garrison previous to the commencement of hostilities. In conversation the Sioux declared a very strong feeling against the settlers in the county, as they frightened away the game, and thus interfered with the Indians' hunting. They had objections to the soldiers being quartered so near them, but said they did not blame the men as they, being soldiers, had to obey orders and go where they were sent. The settlers, on the other hand, had encroached upon them of their own free will and as a matter of choice, and therefore should be severely dealt with.

No more Indians were seen about the fort until September 26, when, as Captain Freeman's company were watering their horses at the river, a volley was fired at them by a party of Sioux in ambush. A teamster with the expedition was hit and mortally wounded. The soldiers being unarmed could not reply, but from the log building and breastworks of the fort a brisk fire was opened up, and several of the Indians were seen to fall. At one time two Indians were seen skulking near the river, and they were fired upon by men on the fortifications and seen to fall. Whenever the Indians congregated near the fort or within range, a shell from the howitzer (the Indians call a shell, rotten bullet), would fall among them and cause them to withdraw hurriedly.

A detachment composed of Captain Freeman's mounted men, fifty soldiers of the Third Regiment, and a squad in charge of a howitzer were ordered in pursuit of the savages and started over the prairie, up the river. About two miles away they came upon the Sioux camp, but the red warriors did not stay to contest its possession but fled in haste and consternation. A few shots were fired at them which they answered with yells of defiance. A shell from the howitzer, however, quieted their noise and added to the celerity of their retreat. Their camp was taken possession of and the valuable part of the result of the savages' looting taken to the fort. The balance was burned on the spot. This was about the last skirmish with the redskins around Fort Abercrombie.

In the meantime steps had been taken at headquarters to punish the Sioux for their outbreak and to demonstrate to those red fiends that the arm of the government is long. It is necessary, in this connection, to go back to the beginning of the massacre and briefly relate the formation and movements of the more formidable column that broke the strength of Little Crow's forces, and drove the Sioux to a complete surrender.

When the news of the outbreak at Yellow Medicine and elsewhere reached St. Paul, there was considerable consternation. Most of the able-bodied young men had gone to the front to fight in defence of the Union; there were no arms on hand in the state arsenals, nor ammunition in its magazines. Transportation, even, was wanting. Governor Ramsey energetically exerted himself to supply the deficiency. He telegraphed for arms and ammunition to the war department at Washington, and to the governors of neighboring states. He also authorized the taking of private teams for public use, and other timely acts. Fortunately there were still at Fort Snelling portions of a couple of regiments not yet filled and some recruits for regiments then at the front. Col. Henry H. Sibley, a man well fitted for the place by years of experience among the Indians was appointed to the command of a column to march to the relief of the settlers and to punish the Sioux for their murders and depredations. Hastily gathering some four hundred men of the Sixth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, he started, August 20, for the scene of butchery. An inspection of the arms and ammunition furnished his troops developed the fact that the guns were worthless Austrian muskets, warranted to do more damage at the breech than at the muzzle, and that the cartridges furnished were of a calibre of a size larger than the bore of the gun, hence useless. Under these circumstances the expedition went into camp near St. Peter, where all hands were engaged in hammering the bullets down to a size to fit the barrels of the guns and in the preparing of cannister shot for the guns of the six-pounder battery with them. In the meantime reinforcements came in, better arms were procured and transportation had been arranged. The column resumed its march and went into camp near Fort Ridgley and took up its daily routine of drill and scouting work while awaiting provisions. Here the Colonel learned that the Indians had called in all their scattered bands and were concentrating to oppose his forward movement and to give him battle. Scouting parties were sent out in all directions to ascertain the whereabouts of the savage foe. These returned with the report that there were no Indians below the Yellow Medicine river. In accordance with this Colonel Sibley sent out a party to bury the dead at the lower agency. This detachment consisted of twenty men in the burial party escorted by about two hundred men, partly mounted, all under the command of Major J. R. Brown. Fifty-four bodies were given decent burial. On their return the command went into camp at Birch Coulie. Usual precautions were taken and no immediate fears of Indians were apprehended. About half past four in the morning of September 2, the camp was awakened by the shouts of attacking Sioux and by a furious fusillade of bullets. A fearful battle ensued, and for the numbers engaged is said to have been one of the most bloody in the war. The loss of men in proportion to those engaged was extremely large, twenty-three killed or mortally wounded, forty-five severely wounded and nearly all suffered some harm or loss. Nearly all the horses, ninety in number, were shot down. The report of the volleys of musketry was fortunately heard by Colonel Sibley, although in camp some eighteen miles away, and he marched to the relief of his struggling detachment. Coming up he drove off the savage foes, buried the dead and all returned to camp. After the battle, which showed Little Crow the futility of his efforts toward subduing the whites, all the marauding bands scattered around were called in and Little Crow and his forces commenced their retreat up the Minnesota river toward the Yellow Medicine. September 16, Colonel Sibley, whose forces had been largely increased, both by some independent companies and by the Minnesota Third Infantry, then home on parole, ordered the advance of the whole column. On the evening of September 22, he reached Wood lake, in what is now Yellow Medicine county, Minnesota. The next morning about seven o'clock a force of some three hundred yelling savages appeared firing on the troops as rapidly as they could. The troops under Sibley were cool and determined. The Third Regiment, veterans from the front, were not to be scared by noise, and needed no urging from their officers. The fight lasted four hours, during which we lost four killed and fifty wounded. The enemy's loss was much heavier, fourteen of their dead were left on the field while many bodies were carried off as is usual among Indians. Disaster after disaster came thus to foil the schemes of Little Crow. None of the principal places had fallen into his hands. Fort Ridgley, New Ulm, St. Peter, Mankato were still unharmed, and at Birch Coulie and Wood lake the Sioux had suffered severe loss and defeat. The warriors turned against their leader and began to sue for peace. On the same day as that on which the battle of Wood lake had occurred, a deputation from the Wahpeton band came in under a flag of truce, asking terms of peace. These were arranged. All the captives in their possession were first to be given up. Of these there were one hundred and seven pure white and one hundred and sixty-two half breeds, mostly women and children. Other tribes soon came in and surrendered.

A military commission tried most of the Indians who gave themselves up, and found three hundred and twenty-one of them guilty of murder, rapine, arson, larceny and other light crimes. Three hundred and three were recommended for capital punishment, the rest to various terms of imprisonment. A mistaken policy upheld by those in the far east, who had suffered naught by the hands of the red fiends, stayed the hands of justice, and it was only by the greatest efforts that the people of Minnesota and the Dakotas, who had lost their all, who had been driven from their homes and who had seen those nearest and dearest slain by these incarnate devils, that the justice which should have been meted out by wholesale, was enforced in a retail way by the hanging of thirty-eight of the ringleaders, at Mankato, December 26, 1862.

After the defeat at Wood lake, Little Crow with the portion of the bands that still clung to his fortunes, retreated in the direction of Big Stone lake, some sixty miles westward. Sibley sent after them a messenger saying that he would pursue the deserters and should show them no mercy, that their only chance was to return at the earliest moment and surrender themselves and their families. By the 8th of October some two thousand of them had come in and given themselves up.

Parties were now sent out to round up the balance of the savages with various success. Lieutenant-Colonel Marshall, with two hundred and fifty men took various small parties of Indians and kept pressing on the trail of the others. Soon their course led toward the Big Sioux river. They pursued and crossed that stream, and on the evening of October 16, the Lieutenant-Colonel and fifty of his men found themselves near Twin lakes, in what is now Codington county, South Dakota. Here they captured some thirteen braves with their families. Pressing on about half way between the Big Sioux and James rivers they made prisoners of quite a large number.

It was deemed wise by the military authorities at Washington, and by Major General John A. Pope, commanding the department of the Northwest, that a second campaign be undertaken against those of the Sioux who still hung out sullenly in arms against the government. These had all been concerned in the massacre and had fled to the upper prairies of North Dakota, where they had all been hospitably received and harbored by their powerful brethren of that region. Accordingly General Sully, commanding the district of the upper Missouri, and General (formerly Colonel) Sibley, commanding the district of Minnesota, were summoned to the headquarters of the department at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, to confer with General Pope. It was decided that a large force under the district commanders mentioned, should march as early in the summer of 1863 as was practicable. One column was to proceed from Sioux City, Iowa, on the Missouri river, and the other from some point on the Minnesota river. The objective point of both columns was Devil's lake, where it was thought the main body of the savages would be found. The force under General Sully was to be composed entirely of cavalry. Sibley's force was made up of the Sixth and Seventh and parts of the Ninth and Tenth Minnesota Infantry, and companies of the Minnesota Mounted Rangers, and the Third Minnesota Battery Light Artillery. The latter was commanded by Captain Jones. In due time the column from Minnesota started, with Brigadier General Sibley in command. It pressed on toward the rendezvous at Devil's lake, through much distress and discomfort, the weather being very warm, and the prairies were parched with the drought. Finally they reached that point, but found no hostile Indians. The Red Lake Indians informed the General that the large camps of the Sioux were off to the south and west on the coteaus of the Missouri. This was the direction from which General Sully was to be expected. General Sibley, leaving his sick, footsore and weary in a strongly entrenched camp on the banks of the Upper Cheyenne, took the greater part of his forces and started toward the Missouri river. He succeeded in falling in with a large camp in which many of the refugees could be found, and which contained several hundred warriors. He attacked them briskly and defeated them with considerable loss. As they retreated upon stronger positions and larger camps he pursued them, and attacked them wherever he could find them. Like resistless fate he pushed on, rolling the panic stricken redmen before him until they had put the floods of the Missouri river between them and their foe. To this day the name of Sibley is a good one among the Sioux, who feared him as they did but few other men. The last battle fought by this column took place about four miles south of the site of the present state capital, Bismarck. On the edge of the coteau with his flank defended by Apple creek, he was attacked by the Indians, July 29, 1863. The Indians crossed over the river for the purpose, having received large reinforcements, and fiercely assailed the soldiers. It was of no avail, however, the redskins were beaten back dismayed, and retreated across the Missouri. Lieutenant Beever, an Englishman, serving as volunteer aid on General Sibley's staff, was killed here while carrying dispatches to Colonel Crooks. For a few days thereafter the column remained in camp at that place, and then, forage and rations growing scarce, and General Sully's forces not appearing, General Sibley marched his men back into Minnesota, and so ended the matter.

Little Crow, the instigator of the massacre and the predominant figure in the whole deplorable affair returned to the vicinity of his old home, and with a small band attempted to steal some horses, with which he, an outlaw now, wanted to go west again. Chauncey Lamson, a settler who lived in the neighborhood of Hutchinson, caught sight of Little Crow and his son in the timber in the southern part of Meeker county, Minnesota, and shot him. The son fled on his father's death. Thus the massacre commenced with Little Crow and ends with Little Crow; began in Meeker county, Minnesota, and ended in the same county.

CHAPTER VII.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT; EARLY MOVEMENTS TOWARDS OBTAINING A TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT; TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT GRANTED; TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

As has been shown in a previous chapter, that on the admission of Minnesota in 1858 to a place in the great sisterhood of states, the eastern part of Dakota, which had previously formed a part of the territory of Minnesota, was left out in the cold. It had no name or legal existence. The western part, that beyond the Missouri, still remained attached to the territory of Nebraska.

EARLY MOVEMENTS TOWARD OBTAINING A TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT.

This state of affairs could not be endured and the settlers, becoming restless, inaugurated movements toward obtaining a territorial form of government if possible. The settlers around Sioux Falls determined to organize a provisional government and an election notice was drawn up and published in the first number of the Dakota Democrat, then just established by Samuel J. Albright. This was the pioneer paper of the whole of Dakota. The notice read as follows:

"Election Notice.—At a mass convention of the people of Dakota territory, held in the town of Sioux Falls, in the county of Big Sioux, on Saturday, September 18, 1858, all portions of the territory being represented, it was resolved and ordered that an election should be held for members to compose a territorial legislature.

"Dated at —, this twentieth day of September, A. D., 1858."

In accordance with the notice the election was held for members of the provisional legislature and delegate to congress. A. G. Fuller was chosen to fill the last named office. The legislature thus elected, met at Sioux Falls in the winter of 1858-59 and organized by the choice of Henry Masters as president of the council, and ex-officio governor, and S. J. Albright, as speaker of the house. The session lasted but a few days. Governor Masters died a short time after this, and is said to have been the first white man to die in the valley.

In the meantime the settlers in the southern part of the country, called a convention to meet at Yankton, which assembled at the, at that time, uncompleted store of D. T. Bramble, November 8, 1858. Mr. Bramble was chosen chairman and M. K. Armstrong, secretary of the meeting. Captain J. B. S. Todd, Obed Foote and Thomas Frek were appointed a committee to draft a set of resolutions. It was determined to memorialize congress for authority to organize as a territory, and for this purpose a committee consisting of Captain J. B. S. Todd, G. D. Fiske and J. M. Stone was appointed to draw up the petition. The next day a similar meeting was held at Vermillion, of which J. A. Denton was chairman, and James McHenry, secretary. Captain J. B. S. Todd was appointed by the people in mass meeting assembled, at both places, to carry their petition to Washington, and lay before the congress of the nation the wishes of the people. In response to their desires a bill looking to the organization of the territory of Dakota was introduced in the senate, but no action was taken upon the matter at that session.

In the fall of 1859 another attempt was made toward territorial organization, and another legislature chosen. J. P. Kidder was elected delegate to congress; S. J. Albright was elected governor, but was returned as a member of the legislature, of which body he was chosen speaker of the house; W. W. Brookings, elected president of the council, was declared ex-officio governor. Memorials to congress were again prepared and given to Mr. Kidder to lay before that body. On his arrival in Washington, and claiming admission to that congress as a delegate, it was denied him, he failing of securing his seat by but a few votes, however. At that time politics ran high and the strife between the parties intense in this country, then just on the eve of the most stupendous civil war in the history of nations. Everything in our national council was more or less subservient to the main question, slavery, its extension or non-extension. The Republican members of congress insisted upon the insertion in the organic act instituting the new territory of Dakota, a clause prohibiting the introduction of slaves, as such, into the territory. That aroused the southern members, whose solid opposition nullified the wishes of the people of Dakota.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT GRANTED.

The now thoroughly aroused settlers again made a strong effort to force recognition from the Federal government. December 27, 1860, a representative convention assembled at Yankton to take action in the matter. On the 15th of January, 1861, a lengthy and earnest appeal to the government was adopted by this body, to which was appended the names of five hundred and seventy-eight citizens of the wished-for territory. Copies were forwarded to the seat of Federal government at Washington and laid before both houses of congress. At this most stormy session of the national councils, a bill organizing the territory of Dakota was introduced, and most of the members from the southern states having in the meantime withdrawn on the eve of rebellion, opposition to the bill ceased and it passed both houses. On the 2nd of March, 1861, President Buchanan signed the act, and the Territory of Dakota at last entered upon its legal existence. The bill organizing the same was passed by the senate February 26, and the house March 1. Dakota, at that time, embraced an area of over 350,000 square miles, and included all of Montana, Wyoming and part of Idaho. These were subsequently detached, the last change of boundaries being made in 1873 in readjusting the line between Dakota and Montana.

TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

No officers were appointed by the outgoing administration, but in May, 1861, President Abraham Lincoln commissioned William Jayne, of Illinois, first governor. About the same time the following territorial officers were appointed: John Hutchinson, of Minnesota, secretary; Philemon Bliss, of Ohio, chief justice; Lorenzo P. Williston, of Pennsylvania, and Joseph L. Williams, of Tennessee, associate justices; William E. Gleason, United States district attorney; William T. Shaffer, of Illinois, United States marshal; and George D. Hill, of Michigan, surveyor-general.

W. A. Burleigh was appointed agent at the Yankton Indian reservation, and H. W. Gregory to that of Ponca.

Governor Jayne was a resident of Springfield, Illinois, at the time of his appointment, and was engaged in the practice of his profession, medicine. He enjoyed the intimate friendship of Abraham Lincoln, who esteemed him highly and thus sought to honor.

Governor Jayne and his secretary arrived at Yankton May 27, 1861, that having been designated as the territorial capital, and opened the executive office in a log cabin opposite Ash's tavern. The surveyor-general's office was located at first in Bramble's building. The first official act of the new governor was the appointment of agents to take a census of the new territory upon which to base the apportionment for representation in the general assembly, and the following were named: Andrew J. Harlan, for the district east of the Vermillion river and south of Sioux Falls; W. W. Brookings, for the Sioux Falls district; Obed Foote, for the Yankton district, which extended westerly from the Vermillion river to Yankton; George M. Pinney, for the Bon Homme district; J. D. Morse, for the country on the Missouri river north of the Niobrara river; and Henry D. Betts for the country of the Red river valley. These gentlemen made a report, according to one account, showing a population in what is now North Dakota, entire whites, 76; of mixed breeds, 514, making a total of 590. In what is now South Dakota the same authority gives as the population: Whites, 1,140; half-breeds, 46; or a population for the entire territory, excluding Indians, of 1,775. Other accounts place the whole number of people in the entire territory at that time at 2,879, and the commissioner of immigration, in his report for 1887, places it for the year 1860 at 4,837, basing his figures upon the census report of the general government for the year mentioned.

On the 13th of July, following his installation into office, the governor made an apportionment of the Territory into three judicial districts, as follows: All that part of the territory of Dakota lying east of the line between ranges 53 and 54 west of the fifth principal meridian, should be known as the first judicial district, and should be presided over by Hon. L. W. Williston; all that part of the territory lying between the line dividing ranges 53 and 54 and the line dividing ranges 57 and 58, was designated as the second district, and Hon. Philemon Bliss assigned to preside over its judicial functions. The third district was constituted of the west part of the territory and presided over by Judge Joseph L. Williams. By a proclamation dated July 29, 1861, the governor established legislative districts throughout the territory and apportioned the representation as follows:

"All that portion of Dakota territory lying between the Missouri and Big Sioux rivers, and bounded on the west by the range line dividing ranges 50 and 51 west and that portion of Dakota territory lying west of the Red River of the North, and including the settlement at and adjacent to Pembina and St. Joseph, shall comprise the first council district, and be entitled to two councilmen.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded by the Vermillion river on the west and on the east by the line dividing ranges 50 and 51, shall compose the second council district, and be entitled to two councilmen.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded by the Vermillion river on the east, on the west by the line dividing ranges 53 and 54 west, shall compose the third council district, and be entitled to one councilman.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded on the east by the line dividing ranges 53 and 54, and on the west by the line dividing ranges 57 and 58 west, shall compose the fourth council district, and be entitled to two councilmen.

"All that portion of Dakota Territory bounded on the east by Choteau creek and on the west by a line west of and including that settlement known as the Hamilton settlement, and also that portion of Dakota situated between the Missouri and Niobrara rivers, shall compose the sixth council district and be entitled to one councilman.

"All that portion of Dakota Territory situated between the Missouri and Big Sioux rivers and bounded on the west by the line dividing ranges 50 and 51 west, and bounded on the north by the line dividing townships 94 and 95 north, shall compose the first representative district, and shall be entitled to two representatives.

"All that portion of Dakota territory lying west of the Big Sioux river and bounded on the south by the line dividing townships 94 and 95, and on the west by the line dividing ranges 50 and 51, and on the north by a line drawn due east and west from the south end of Lake Preston, shall constitute the second representative district, and be entitled to one representative.

"All that portion of Dakota territory lying on the Red river of the North, including the settlements at St. Joseph and Pembina, shall compose the third representative district, and be entitled to one representative.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded by the Vermillion river on the west, and on the east by the line dividing ranges 50 and 51, shall compose the fourth representative district, and be entitled to two representatives.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded by the Vermillion river on the east and on the west by the line dividing ranges 53 and 54, shall compose the fifth representative district, and be entitled to two representatives.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded on the east by the line dividing ranges 53 and 54, and on the west by the line dividing ranges 57 and 58, shall compose the sixth representative district, and be entitled to two representatives.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded on the east by the line dividing ranges 57 and 58 west, on the west by Choteau creek, shall compose the seventh representative district, and be entitled to two representatives.

"All that portion of Dakota territory bounded on the east by Choteau creek, and on the west by a line drawn west of and to include the settlement known as the Hamilton settlement; and, also, that portion of Dakota territory situated between the Missouri and the Niobrara rivers, shall compose the eighth representative district and be entitled to one representative."

In the same proclamation the new executive appointed the following polling places for the use of the citizens in the various parts of the Territory. To quote his own words:

"I do hereby establish in the aforesaid districts the following places for voting:

"In the first representative district, at the dwelling house of Thomas Maloney, and do appoint as judges of election thereat William Matthews, James Somers and Thomas Maloney; and also at the hotel of Eli Wilson, in Elk Point, and do appoint as judges thereat Sherman Clyde, William Frisbie and K. P. Ronne. In the second representative district, at the house of William Amidon, and do appoint as judges G. P. Waldron, Barney Fowler and John Kelts. In the third representative district at the house of Charles Le May, in the town of Penbina, and do appoint as judges Charles Le May, James McFetridge and H. Donelson; and also at the house of Baptiste Shorette, in the town of St. Joseph, and do appoint as judges Baptiste Shorette, Charles Bottineau and Antoine Zangreau.

"In the fourth representative district, at the house of James McHenry, and do appoint as judges A. J. Harlan, Ole Anderson and A. Eckles. In the fifth representative district, at the house of Bly Wood, and do appoint as judges Ole Olson, Bly Wood and Ole Bottolfson. In the sixth representative district, at the office of Todd & Frost, and do appoint as judges M. K. Armstrong, F. Chapel and J. S. Presho. In the seventh representative district, at Herrick's hotel, in Bon Homme, and do appoint as judges Daniel Gifford, George M. Pinney and George Falkenburg. And in the eighth district, at the house of F. D. Pease, and do appoint as judges J. V. Hamilton, Benjamin Estes and Joseph Ellis, and also at Gregory's store, and appoint as judges Charles Young, James Tufts and Thomas Small."

About this time the various candidates for the position of delegate to congress began to come forward and make efforts to capture that office.

Prominent among the settlers at that time was Captain John B. S. Todd, an ex-army officer and a relative of Mrs. Lincoln's, a man who was a leader in the movement toward organization, and filled a foremost place in the opinions of his friends and neighbors; he was the leading candidate. The opposition to him crystallized and settled upon A. J. Bell as their choice. Later Charles P. Booge, then in business at Sioux City, but who claimed a residence within the territory, announced himself as a candidate for the same office.

The election, which was held Monday, September 16, 1861, resulted in the election of Mr. Todd, who received 397 votes. A. J. Bell received 78 votes and Charles P. Booge 110.

The first territorial legislature, which was chosen at this election, met at Yankton, March 17, 1862, and continued in session until May 15, following. The membership was as follows:

Council—John H. Shober, H. D. Betts, J. W. Boyle, D. T. Bramble, W. W. Brookings, A. Cole, Jacob Deuel, J. S. Gregory and Enos Stutsman.

House—George M. Pinney, Moses K. Armstrong, Lyman Burgess, J. A. Jacobson, John C. McBride, Christopher Maloney, A. W. Puett, John Stanage, John L. Tiernan, Hugh S. Donaldson, Reuben Wallace, George P. Waldron and B. E. Wood.

On their organization the council chose the following officers: J. H. Shober, president; James Tufts, secretary; E. M. Bond, assistant secretary; W. R. Goodfellow, engrossing and enrolling clerk; S. W. Ingham, chaplain; Charles F. Picotte, sergeant-at-arms; E. B. Wixon, messenger, and W. W. Warford, fireman. The house, on organization, selected as their officers: George M. Pinney, speaker; J. R. Hanson, chief clerk; J. M. Allen, assistant clerk; D. Gifford, enrolling clerk; B. M. Smith, engrossing clerk; M. D. Metcalf, chaplain; James or M. H. Somers, sergeant-at-arms; A. B. Smith, messenger; and Ole Anderson, fireman.

The second general election was held September 1, 1862, and in some parts of the territory considerable excitement prevailed. The board of canvassers gave the rival candidates for the position of delegate to congress, William Jayne and J. B. S. Todd, 237 and 221 votes respectively, they for some reason throwing out the vote of Bon Homme and Charles Mix counties. The Red river valley apparently made no returns of this election. Governor Jayne was declared elected to congress, but a contest for the seat was instituted by Captain Todd before congress, and the latter, proving his case, was given the place.

Captain Todd served in the capacity of delegate to the national house of representatives during the years 1861 and 1863. He was succeeded by W. F. Burleigh, whose term of service was from 1864 to 1869; S. L. Spink, 1869-71; Moses K. Armstrong, 1871-75; J. P. Kidder, 1875-79; G. G. Bennett, 1879-81; R. F. Pettigrew, 1881-83; J. B. Raymond, 1883-85; Oscar S. Gifford, 1885-88; and George A. Mathews, 1888-89, successively filled this high office.

Dr. William Jayne, the first governor of Dakota territory, occupied the position of first magistrate for two years, being succeeded in 1863 by Newton Edmunds. In 1866 Andrew J. Faulk was appointed governor, and remained in that office until 1869, when he gave way for John A. Burbank. The latter's term of service was from 1869 to 1874. John L. Pennington, the next incumbent, served until 1878. His successor, William A. Howard, was appointed and qualified for the office. Governor Howard died April 10, 1880, while still in the gubernatorial chair, and Nehemiah G. Ordway, of New Hampshire, was appointed to fill the vacancy. The latter's term of service expired in 1884. Gilbert A. Pierce, the next appointee, filled the position from 1884 till 1887, when he, in turn, made way for his successor, Louis K. Church. In 1889 Arthur C. Mellette became governor of the territory by appointment, and was the first governor of the state of South Dakota by election.

Of the secretaries of the territory of Dakota, the first one appointed was John L. Hutchinson, who continued in office from 1861 until 1865; he was succeeded by S. L. Spink. The latter held the position until 1869. During the latter year Turney M. Wilkins was appointed and held the office until the following year, when George A. Batchelder was appointed to the place. Edwin S. McCook was appointed in 1872. He was assassinated by Peter P. Wintermute in September, 1873. The next to fill the position was Oscar Whitney, who held the same from the date of his predecessor's death until the appointment of his successor, George H. Hand, in 1874. The latter remained in office until 1883, when he was succeeded by J. M. Teller. In 1886 Michael McCormack was appointed Mr. Teller's successor, and was succeeded, in 1889, by L. B. Richardson, who was the last to be appointed to that office.

Presidential appointees who filled the important office of chief justice during territorial days were: Philemon Bliss, 1861-64; Ara Bartlett, 1865-69; George W. French, 1869-73; Peter C. Shannon, 1873-81; A. J. Edgerton, 1881-85, and Bartlett Tripp, 1885-89.

Of those who acted as associate justices while the territory was in existence, the following is a list, with the date of their services. Many of them will be recognized as prominent members of the Dakota bar before and after their terms upon the bench, and others occupied more exalted positions. They were: S. P. Williston, 1861-65; J. Kidder died while in office in 1883, and was succeeded by C. S. Palmer, of Vermont.

Excitement was rife, but after a long and patient hearing the board reached a conclusion, and June 2, 1883, located the future territorial capital at the, then, rising city of Bismarck.

STATEHOOD;

EARLY MOVEMENT TOWARD ADMISSION TO THE UNION; HURON CONVENTION; SIOUX FALLS CONVENTION; OTHER BILLS FOR ADMISSION; SECOND CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION AT SIOUX FALLS; OMNIBUS BILL AND ADMISSION; CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION AT BISMARCK; OFFICIAL VOTE FOR GOVERNOR; STATE OFFICERS; STATE DIRECTORY; GENERAL ASSEMBLIES, ETC.

EARLY MOVEMENT TOWARD ADMISSION TO THE UNION.

At a very early day in its territorial history, Dakota endeavored to be admitted into the Federal Union as a full fledged state. The first movement looking to that end came up in 1870, and was the natural outgrowth of a feeling that it was for the best interests of all that the territory should be divided. Discussions of various kinds took place all over the territory at that time and finally culminated in the legislature, the representative of public opinion, adopting, January 12, 1871, a memorial to congress asking that body to divide the territory into two parts, the division to be made on the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude. This bill was passed by a unanimous vote. Similar acts were adopted December 31, 1872; December 19, 1874, and January 24, 1877. At the session of the thirteenth legislature, in 1879, a protest was made against a talked of admission of Dakota as a state without the division desired. The general, almost universal, opinion being in favor of the division. January 7, 1880, G. G. Bennett, the delegate to congress from Dakota, presented a bill to the national house of representatives, providing for the admission to the Union of all that part of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel as a state, and the formation of the balance, now North Dakota, into a territory, to be called Pembina. December 6, 1880, the same member presented a bill to the house asking for admission of Dakota, without division, while the same day Senator A. S. Paddock, of Nebraska, introduced a bill in the house authorizing the people of Dakota to form a constitution looking toward statehood. December 19, 1881, R. F. Pettigrew, then territorial delegate in congress, presented to that body two bills, one for the admission of all that part of the territory south of the forty-sixth degree of north latitude into the Union as a state, and the other for the organization of the north half of the territory into the territory of North Dakota. At the previous session of congress, March 22, 1880, Senator Samuel J. Kirkwood, of Iowa, had presented a bill for the organization of what is now North Dakota into a territory, to be called Pembina, and in 1881 Senator Saunders, of Nebraska, introduced a bill with the same object. In that year the territorial legislature presented a memorial asking for the division of the territory into three states or territories. During the following winter more than one hundred of the leading citizens of Dakota went to Washington to urge upon congress action upon a bill enabling South Dakota to form a state constitution, and to elect officers preparatory to admission to the Union as a state. Although the matter was received favorably by both houses of congress and the measure seemed for a time likely to meet with favor, political consideration caused it to be set aside.

During the last few days of the legislative session of 1883 a bill was passed by both houses of that body, almost unanimously, authorizing South Dakota to hold a convention and form a constitution, the expenses to be paid out of the territorial treasury. The bill died in the governor's hands. He did not desire to veto it, for political reasons, but declined to sign it, giving as a reason, that, as the people of South Dakota were alone to profit by it, he could not see the justice of the whole territory paying for it. This course provoked much indignation among the friends of the measure. There was, at the same session of the legislature a bill passed that added to the discontent of the people of the southern half of the territory. This was for the removal of the capital, which was re-located at Bismarck, in the north half. This helped increase the desire for separation and the statehood of South Dakota. The removal of the capital provoked intense feeling, and meetings were held throughout the lower half of the territory, denouncing the legislature, and calling for the resignation or removal of Governor Ordway. The feeling for renewed and stronger efforts looking toward the division of the territory and the admission of South Dakota became intensified, and the jealousy that had existed between the two sections of the territory received increased force.

Previous to this, on the 21st of June, 1882, delegates from ten counties in the south part of the territory met in convention at Canton. This meeting called itself the Citizens' Constitutional Association. Its object was to consider the subject of a constitutional convention, increase the membership of the legislature and other matters that might arise. An executive committee of seven was appointed to act on these lines.

HURON CONVENTION.

In June, 1883, in accordance with a call made by the committee above, a convention met at Huron. This was made up of one hundred and eighty-eight delegates from thirty-four counties, all of which lay in South Dakota. Assuming to speak for the people of the whole territory, the north half of which had no representative present, they adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, By the representatives of Dakota in convention assembled, in the name and by the authority of Dakota, that the interests and wishes of the people of Dakota demand a division of this territory on the forty-sixth parallel; that on this measure the wishes of the people of Dakota who live south of this parallel are practically unanimous, and that this is their fixed and unalterable will."

This was accompanied by an ordinance providing for the assembling of a constitutional convention to be held at Sioux Falls to enact the organic law preparatory to the admission of that part of the territory as a state.

SIoux FALLS CONVENTION.

September 4, 1883, the convention met at Sioux Falls to draft the constitution for the prospective state. This body held a session of fourteen days, and the result of their labors was submitted to the action of the voters in forty-two counties of the south half of the territory. The total vote cast was 19,150, of which 12,336 were in favor of the constitution, and 6,814 against it. But all in vain the people waited for the necessary congressional authority to organize as a state, which never came.

OTHER BILLS FOR ADMISSION.

In the meantime, J. R. Raymond, the delegate in congress for Dakota, December 11, 1883, presented a bill before congress establishing the territory of North Dakota, which was referred to the committee on territory, where it perished like other measures to the same end presented before. The following January Senator Angus Cameron of Wisconsin, laid a bill before the senate similar to the above, which shared the same fate.

February 4, 1884, Martin Maginnis, the delegate from Montana, presented to congress a bill authorizing the people of the whole of Dakota to form a constitution looking toward statehood. A few days previous Senator Angus Cameron, of Wisconsin, had presented a bill of like character to the senate. Both these, also were referred to the proper committee and failed to materialize subsequently upon the floor of congress. During the same month two bills were presented in the senate by Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, afterwards President of the United States, enabling the people of South Dakota to draft a constitution and to be admitted into the Federal Union as a state. These, also, met with the usual fate. The first was referred to the committee on territories, and never saw the light again. The other, although passed by the senate, was hung up in the committee of the house. In all this agitation it seems to have been the people of South Dakota that were making the most of the effort. In many of the movements North Dakota was apparently not represented.

A bill providing for the admission of South Dakota south of the forty-sixth degree of latitude, was again presented in the senate by Hon. Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, January 11, 1886, which passed that that body February 5 following. On the 9th of February it was laid before the house of representatives, and by that body was referred to the committee on territories. That committee, of which William M. Springer, of Illinois, was chairman, reported back the bill adversely, May 25 following.

THE SECOND CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION AT SIOUX FALLS.

A second constitutional convention was held at Sioux Falls by the citizens of South Dakota, in September, 1885. This also adopted a state constitution, which was submitted to the voters of the November election of that year. Out of a total vote of 31,791 electors, 25,226 voted in favor of the constitution and 6,565 against it. A full state ticket for officers of the new state was also elected with A. C. Mellette as governor. But congress proved obdurate and the admission of the state was again postponed.

OMNIBUS BILL AND ADMISSION.

Other measures there were, but they all culminated in the passage of a bill by both houses of congress in the winter of 1888-89, which was approved by the president February 22, 1889, which, among other things, divided the state into two parts and admitted both to the honor of statehood. This bill, commonly called the Omnibus bill, was as follows:

"An act to provide for the division of Dakota into two states and to enable the people of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana and Washington to form constitutions and state governments, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states, and to make donations of public lands to such states.

"Section 1. That the inhabitants of all that part of the area of the United States now constituting the territories of Dakota, Montana and Washington, as at present described, may become the states of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana and Washington, respectively, as hereinafter provided.

"Section 2. The area comprising the territory of Dakota shall, for the purposes of this act, be divided on the line of the seventh standard parallel produced west, to the western boundary of said territory; and the delegates elected as hereinafter provided to the constitutional convention in the districts north of said parallel shall assemble in convention, at the time prescribed in this act, at the city of Bismarck; and the delegates in the districts south of said parallel shall, at the same time, assemble in convention at Sioux Falls.

"Section 3. That all persons who are qualified by the laws of said territories to vote for representatives to the legislative assemblies thereof, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form conventions in said proposed states; and the qualifications for delegates to such conventions shall be such as by the laws of said territories respectively persons are required to possess to be eligible to the legislative assemblies thereof; and the aforesaid delegates to form said conventions shall be appointed within the limits of the proposed states, in such districts as may be established as herein provided, in proportion to the population in each of said counties and districts, as near as may be, to be ascertained at the time of making said apportionments by the persons hereinafter authorized to make the same, from the best information obtainable, in each of which districts three delegates shall be elected, but no elector shall vote for more than two persons for delegates to such conventions; that said apportionments shall be made by the governor, the chief justice and the secretary of said territories; and the governor of said territories shall, by proclamation, order an election of the delegates in each of said proposed states, to be held on the Tuesday after the second Monday in May, 1889, which proclamation shall be issued on the 15th day of April, 1889; and such election shall be conducted, returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificates of persons elected to such conventions issued in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said territories regulating elections therein for delegates to congress; and the number of votes cast for delegates in each precinct shall also be returned. The number of delegates to said conventions respectively shall be seventy-five; and all persons resident in said proposed states, who are qualified voters of said territories, as herein provided, shall be entitled to vote upon the election of delegates, and under such rules and regulations as said conventions may prescribe, not in conflict with this act, upon the ratification or rejection of the constitutions.

"Section 4. That the delegates to the conventions elected as provided in this act shall meet at the seat of government of each of said territories, except the delegates elected in South Daota, who shall meet at the city of Sioux Falls, on the 4th of July, 1889, and after organization shall declare, on behalf of the people of said proposed states, that they adopt the constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and are hereby authorized to form constitutions and state governments for said proposed states respectively. The constitutions shall be republican in form, and make no distinctions in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not to be repugnant to the constitution of the United States, and the principles of the declaration of independence. And said conventions shall provide, by ordinances irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said states:

"First—That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said states shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship.

"Second—That the people inhabiting said proposed states do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries thereof, and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes; and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and said Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the congress of the United States; that the lands belonging to the citizens of the United States residing without the said states shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the states on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States or reserved for its use. But nothing herein, or in the ordinances herein provided for, shall preclude the said states from taxing as other lands are taxed any lands owned or held by any Indian who has severed his tribal relations and has obtained from the United States or from any person a title thereto by patent or other grant, save and except such lands as may have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation; but said ordinances shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said states so long and to such extent as such act of congress may prescribe.

"Third—That the debts and liabilities of said territories shall be assumed and paid by said states respectively.

"Fourth—That provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of systems of public schools, and which shall be open to all the children of said states and free from sectarian control.

"Section 5. That the convention which shall assemble at Bismarck shall form a constitution and state government for a state to be known as North Dakota, and the convention which shall assemble at Sioux Falls shall form a constitution and state government for a state to be known as South Dakota; Provided, that at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in South Dakota, as hereinbefore provided, each elector may have written or printed on his ballot the words 'For the Sioux Falls Constitution,' or the words 'Against the Sioux Falls Constitution,' and the votes on this question shall be returned and canvassed in the same manner as for the election provided for in Sec. 3 of this act; and if a majority of all votes cast on this question shall be 'For the Sioux Falls Constitution,' it shall be the duty of the convention which may assemble at Sioux Falls, as herein provided, to re-submit to the people of South Dakota, for ratification or rejection at the election hereinafter provided for in this act, the constitution framed at Sioux Falls and adopted November 3, 1886, and also the articles and propositions separately submitted at that election, including the question of locating the temporary seat of government, with such changes only as relate to the name and boundary of the proposed state, to the reappointment of the judicial and legislative districts, and such amendments as may be necessary in order to comply with the provisions of this act; and if a majority of the votes cast on the ratification or rejection of the constitution shall be for the constitution irrespective of the articles separately submitted, the state of South Dakota shall be admitted as a state in the Union under said constitution as hereinafter provided; but the archives, records and books of the territory of Dakota shall remain at Bismarck, the capital of North Dakota, until an agreement in reference thereto is reached by said states. But if at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention in South Dakota a majority of all the votes cast at that election shall be 'Against the Sioux Falls Constitution,' then and in that event it shall be the duty of the convention which shall assemble at the city of Sioux Falls on the 4th day of July, 1889, to proceed to form a constitution and state government as provided in this act the same as if that question had not been submitted to a vote of the people of South Dakota.

"Section 6. It shall be the duty of the constitutional conventions of North and South Dakota to appoint a joint commission, to be composed of not less than three members of each convention, whose duty it shall be to assemble at Bismarck, the present seat of government of said territory, and to agree upon an equitable division of all property belonging to the territory of Dakota, the disposition of all public records, and also adjust and agree upon the amount of the debts and liabilities of the territory, which shall be assumed and paid by each of the proposed states of North Dakota and South Dakota, and the agreement reached respecting the territorial debts and liabilities shall be incorporated in the respective constitutions, and each of said states shall oblige itself to pay its proportion of such debts and liabilities the same as if they had been created by such states respectively.

"Section 7. If the constitution formed for both North Dakota and South Dakota shall be rejected by the people at the election for the ratification or rejection of their respective constitutions as provided for in this act, the territorial government of Dakota shall continue in existence the same as if this act had not been passed. But if the constitution formed for either North Dakota or South Dakota shall be rejected by the people, that part of the territory so rejecting its proposed constitution shall continue under the territorial government of the present territory of Dakota, but shall, after the state adopting its constitution is admitted into the Union, be called by the name of the territory of North Dakota or South Dakota, as the case may be; Provided, that if either of the proposed states provided for in this act shall reject the constitution which may be submitted for ratification or rejection at the election provided therefor, the governor of the territory in which such proposed constitution was rejected shall issue his proclamation reconvening the delegates selected to the convention which formed such rejected constitution, fixing the time and place at which said delegates shall assemble; and when so assembled they shall proceed to form another constitution or to amend the rejected constitution, and shall submit such new constitution or amended constitution to the people of the proposed state for ratification or rejection, at such time as said convention may determine, and all the provisions of this act, so far as applicable, shall apply to such convention so reassembled and to the constitution which may be formed, its ratification or rejection, and to the admission of the proposed state.

"Section 8. That the constitutional convention which may assemble in South Dakota shall provide by ordinance for resubmitting the Sioux Falls constitution of 1885, after having amended the same as provided in Section 5 of this act, to the people of South Dakota for ratification or rejection at an election to be held in said proposed state on the said first Tuesday in October. And the constitutional conventions which may assemble in North Dakota, Montana and Washington shall provide in like manner for submitting the constitutions formed by them to the people of said proposed states, respectively, for their ratification or rejection at elections to be held in said proposed states on the said first Tuesday in October. At the election provided for in this section the qualified voters of said proposed states shall vote directly for or against any articles or propositions separately submitted. The returns of said elections shall be made to the secretary of each of said territories, who, with the governor and chief justice thereof, or any two of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast shall be for the constitution, the governor shall certify the result to the president of the United States, together with a statement of the votes cast thereon and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said articles, propositions and ordinances. And if the constitution and government of said proposed states are republican in form, and if all the provisions of this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the president of the United States to issue his proclamation announcing the result of the election in each, and thereupon the proposed states which have adopted constitutions and formed state governments, as herein provided, shall be deemed admitted by congress into the union under and by virtue of this act on an equal footing with the original states from and after the date of said proclamation.

"Section 9. # CHAPTER IX.

CREATION AND ORGANIZATION OF COUNTIES; FIRST OFFICERS, ETC.; PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS; SOME FIRST ITEMS.

CREATION AND ORGANIZATION OF COUNTIES.

In response to public sentiment evinced from time to time, and in accordance with the time-honored plan of government adopted in this country, the legislature formed and created local civil sub-divisions of the state for convenience of revenue, local government and judicial jurisdiction. Each became, as it were, a cog in the machinery of the popular government; a part of the state in its widest sense. The record of these events, with the individuals who first steered the counties' fortunes are collected together in this chapter for convenience of reference and for consistency of relation.

Cavalier county was created from a part of Pembina county, January 4, 1873. Its boundaries were changed several times, in 1883, 1885 and 1887. June 16, 1884, Governor Ordway made the appointment of the following named as a board of commissioners to organize the county: Patrick McHugh, W. H. Mathews and L. C. Norveong. The first meeting of the board was held at Langton, July 8, 1884, and it proceeded to organize by the election of L. C. Norveong as chairman, and Mr. McHugh resigning, W. J. Doyle was elected to fill his place on the board. The first officers chosen to carry on the business of the county, until the regular election, were as follows: W. J. Mooney, judge of probate and county treasurer; Patrick McHugh, register of deeds and county clerk. At the August meeting of the board Charles B. Nelson was appointed treasurer.

The following November the election resulted in the choice of the following officers: Patrick McHugh, register of deeds; C. B. Nelson, treasurer; H. D. Allert, superintendent of public schools; Clarence Hawks, sheriff; James J. Reilly, coroner; W. J. Mooney, judge of probate; James M. Starkweather, county surveyor; Albert M. Comes, county assessor; Charles Jackson, Joseph Hamann, W. H. Conn and Charles Thomm, justices of the peace. The county seat was located at Langdon.

Richland county, which was named in honor of M. T. Rich, one of its earliest settlers and influential and prominent citizens, was created January 4, 1873, by legislative enactment. Its boundaries have been changed twice, once in 1883 and again in 1885. The county was organized in the summer of 1873, commissioners for that purpose having been appointed by the governor. The board of commissioners, consisting of J. W. Branding, chairman, and D. Wilnot Smith and M. T. Rich, after their appointment, met at the residence of Mr. Rich and selected Wahpeton for the county seat. They, also, appointed the following officers, to hold office until the first election: Hugh Blanding, county clerk and register of deeds; J. Q. Burbank, treasurer, and W. E. Root, sheriff. In November, 1873, the following named were elected to fill the various county offices: John Smith, Alexander McCall and John Kotschevar, commissioners; J. M. Ruggles, county clerk and register of deeds; John Q. Burbank, county treasurer and probate judge; Job Herrick, sheriff; H. C. N. Myhra, assessor; J. M. Ruggles, county superintendent of schools; and S. H. Fowler, John Haslehurst and William Weiss, justices of the peace. At the time of this election there were but few settlers within the boundaries of the county and it was made one voting precinct, the polling place being located at Wahpeton. About sixty votes were cast. At the presidential election of 1896 some three thousand ballots were deposited by voters in Richland county. A fine court house was built at Wahpeton in 1881, but it was destroyed by fire in 1883. It was at once rebuilt better than before, at a cost of above $22,000.

Wells county was set off by act of legislature as Gingras county, January 4, 1873. The name was changed February 26, 1881, and the boundaries readjusted in 1883, and again in 1885. June 24, 1884, the governor appointed as a board of commissioners to organize the county the following gentlemen: Marshal R. Brinton, chairman; Joseph P. Cox and Thomas R. Williams. They held their first meeting August 28, 1884. The first officers of Wells county were: J. J. Le Tourman, county clerk and register of deeds; J. J. O'Connell, sheriff; Charles V. Brown, assessor; D. T. Davis, treasurer; Newton Athow, surveyor; Frank McCallon, coroner; Richard Wixey, superintendent of the schools, and T. C. J. Wych, probate judge. Sykes-ton was chosen as the county seat. The present seat of justice in the county is Fessenden.

Sargent county was created by an act of the territorial legislature, from part of Ransom county and a part of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indian reservation, March 3, 1883. March 8, of the same year, its boundaries were changed, part being set off to Hyde county. August 1, 1883, the governor appointed, as a board of county commissioners to organize the county, the following named gentlemen: B. S. Haskell, chairman; C. C. Newman and J. R. Herring. These commissioners met for the first time October 8, 1883, and proceeded to organize. The first officers of the county were: T. C. Lauder, register of deeds; L. O. Berg, judge of probate court; John Devlin, sheriff; E. J. Williams, treasurer; James H. Vail, clerk of court. Milnor was chosen for the county seat, but in 1886 the seat of justice in Sargent county was removed to Forman.

McIntosh, which was set off from a part of Logan county, was created March 9, 1883. It was organized by three commissioners who were appointed by the governor, September 25, 1884. This board, which consisted of Charles C. Morrell, George W. Lilly and Charles V. Basye, assembled October 4, the same year, and proceeded to the organization for which they were appointed. The first officers were: John J. Wishek, register of deeds and county clerk; Alanson Richards, judge of probate court; Alexander McDonald, sheriff; Horace S. Bear, treasurer; G. W. Abbott, superintendent of schools; C. D. Johnson, assessor; David Rickey, coroner; S. Basye, C. D. Johnson, W. O. McIntosh and Isaac Lincoln, justices of the peace. Hoskins was selected as the county seat. In November, 1887, by a vote of the electors, the seat of justice was transferred to Ashley.

Emmons county was created by act of legislature, February 10, 1879. October 16, 1883, the governor commissioned James B. Gayton, William L. Yeater and Robert S. Whitney as a board to organize the same. At their first meeting, held in November, they completed the act for which they were appointed and formed the first board of county commissioners. The first officers were: Daniel Williams, auditor; J. N. Ropp, treasurer, and J. Tape, assessor. Williamsport was chosen for the county seat, but some years later it was removed to Linton.

In 1885, from parts of the counties of Stevens, Renville and Wallace, was created a new county which was to bear the name of Ward county. March 11, 1887, its boundaries were changed. J. A. Baker, Chris Rasmussen and John Murray were appointed the first board of county commissioners. The first meeting of the board was held November 23, 1885, in a store building at Burlington, which town was chosen the county seat. The first officers in the new county were: L. S. Foote, county clerk and register of deeds; Amos T. Tracy, sheriff;

Michael Muir, treasurer; James W. Bell, probate judge; Mrs. Frank Spear, county superintendent of schools; James Johnson, clerk of the court, and D. E. Preston, county attorney. A few years later the county seat was removed to Minot.

Mercer county was the outgrowth of legislation of January 14, 1875, when it was created. Twice since its boundaries have been adjusted, once in 1881 and again March 12, 1885. November 6, 1883, the governor appointed Thomas McGrath, Horace C. Walker and George Williams commissioners to organize the county. At the first meeting of the board George Hawley was substituted for Mr. McGrath. This meeting was held August 22, 1884. The first officers were as follows: B. J. Van Vleck, county clerk; S. C. Walker, register of deeds; George Gordon, sheriff; A. R. Granberry, judge of probate; Louis Connolly, treasurer; James McGrath, superintendent of schools; W. C. Fressler, coroner, and J. F. Kiebert, surveyor. Stanton is the county seat.

McHenry county was created from a part of Buffalo county, by legislative action, January 4, 1873. In 1885 and in 1887 the original boundaries were changed. The organization of McHenry county dates from October 15, 1884, when, at a meeting held at Villard postoffice, of which O. M. Towner was chairman and Edward Hackett secretary, the following temporary officers were appointed to carry on the business of the county: G. W. Crane, register of deeds and county clerk; F. A. Frisby, treasurer; Michael McLearn, sheriff; W. D. McClintock, probate judge and county attorney; Parley Teare, assessor; C. E. Jones, county surveyor; George T. Inkster, county superintendent of public schools; R. H. Copeland, coroner. By an act of the territorial legislature it was ordered that a special election be held in McHenry county, on the second Tuesday in May, 1885, for the purpose of electing county officers and for the designation of a temporary county seat. On holding this election Scripton was voted the county seat and the following officers were elected: A. L. Hanson, Ole Gilbertson and J. M. Pendroy, county commissioners; George T. September 20, 1886, the county was divided into five commissioner districts, with the following board: Ole Gilbertson, J. M. Pendroy, O. M. Towner, E. W. Carlwright and Charles Schilling. Towner was made the permanent county seat at the election held November 2, 1886, and the 18th of December of that year, the records and county property were removed to that place.

Stutsman county, which was named in honor of Enos Stutsman, one of the pioneers and prominent citizens of early days, was organized June 10, 1873. The governor appointed A. W. Kelley, George W. Vennum and George Tibbetts commissioners for the purpose. The latter left about the time of the organization and was replaced on the board by H. C. Miller. Mr. Kelley was chosen chairman. The following officers were appointed to fill the places until the election could be held: George W. Vennum, register of deeds; P. Moran, county treasurer; A. McKechnie, sheriff, and Frank C. Myrick, auditor. The first election was held in November, 1873, at which time there were built eighty votes cast. Stutsman county was created by the tenth territorial legislature, January 4, 1873. Its boundaries were changed from those originally assigned it in 1885.

Dickey county was created by an act of the legislature, March 5, 1881, and July 1, 1882, the following named gentlemen were appointed by the governor as a board of commissioners to organize it: R. C. Olin, A. H. Whitney and H. E. Geschke. These met at the Dickey county bank at Ellendale, August 18, 1882, and appointed the following officers: M. M. At this same election the question of location of a permanent county seat was voted upon, and Ellendale had 162 votes and Keystone 62.

Griggs county was formed from parts of Traill and Foster, February 18, 1881. June 10, 1882, Allen Breed, Rollin Cooper and William A. Glives were appointed by the governor a board of county commissioners for the purpose of organization. June 16, 1882, the county seat was located at Hope, but November 7 of the same year, by a vote of the people, the seat of government of the county, was removed to Cooperstown, a division of the county in that year having thrown the town of Hope into the newly formed county of Steele.

Traill county was created by an act of the legislature January 12, 1875, from parts of Burchard, Cass and Grand Forks counties. March 8, 1883, part of the original county was detached and added to the new county of Steele. Asa H. Morgan, John Brown and James Ostland were appointed, January 12, 1875, as a board of commissioners to properly organize the new county, and the southeast quarter of section 15, township 146 north, range XLIX west, was designated as the county seat by act of legislature. June 8 of the same year three commissioners to organize the new sub-division of the state were appointed by the governor. This first board of county commissioners consisted of the following gentlemen: Thomas Ward, P. S. McKay and R. W. Berry. The first officers of the county, other than these, were: E. J. November 16, 1883, the governor made the appointment of three commissioners for the purpose of organizing the new county. The board consisted of Prosper P. Parker, chairman; H. Curtis Davis and John S. Conyers. They held their first meeting January 24, 1884, and selected the following as the first officers: W. E. Wilson, surveyor; Guy W. Germond, superintendent of schools; Dr. Thomas W. Conyers, coroner; John A. Bennett and Charles H. Ensign, justices of the peace. February 14, 1884, the county seat was located at Cando.

Of Ramsey county, the record of organization is as follows: January 25, 1883, D. W. Ensign, E. V. Barton and G. S. Moore, the three commissioners appointed for the purpose by the governor, met at Devil's Lake City. This was a town laid out by Ensign Benham & Co., about two miles southeast of the city of Devil's Lake, near the main lake, on sections 1 and 12, township 153 north, range 64 west. This place was chosen as the county seat. A substantial court house was erected and the town seemed to flourish. The railroad, however, was located a short distance away, and Creel City (now the city of Devil's Lake) was laid out a few months later, when the superior advantages of the latter place drew the older place to it. The county seat was changed and the court house, as well as every other building of the former town, was removed to the site of its younger rival. The first officers elected were: E. V. Barton, D. W. Ensign and H. H. Ruger, commissioners; J. A. Percival, register of deeds; T. C. Saunders, clerk of the court; Charles F. Smith, sheriff, and Capt. J. W. Palmer, treasurer. Ramsey county was created from part of Pembina county, by act of legislature. Several times its boundaries have been changed.

The county of Bottineau was created by act of legislature January 4, 1873, but not organized. Its boundaries as first set off were changed in 1883, and again in 1887. May 13, 1884, the governor appointed a board of county commissioners to organize the county. This consisted of William F. Simrall, Albert C. Barnes and Lorenzo D. Dana. These held their first meeting July 17, and proceeded to select officers to carry on the business of the county until the first regular election. Bottineau was chosen the county seat.

Nelson county was formed by an act of the territorial legislature, March 9, 1883, from parts of Ramsey, Grand Forks and Foster counties. May 15, of the same year, the governor appointed three commissioners to carry out the organization. This first board consisted of the following named: David S. Dodds, Francis I. Kane and George S. March 7, 1881, the governor appointed Frank Probert, Gilbert Hanson and George H. Coulton as commissioners to complete the organization. The first meeting of this board was held April 4, 1881, at Lisbon, that village having been decided upon as the seat of justice. The following were appointed Ransom county's first officers: J. L. Colton, register of deeds; John Kinan, treasurer; J. P. Knight, probate judge; George H. Manning, sheriff; W. W. Bradley, coroner; E. W. Knight, superintendent of schools; A. M. Smith, assessor, and E. C. Pindall, surveyor. At a meeting of the board, held May 16, 1881, the Lisbon Star, a newspaper, was made the official journal of the county. The county drew its name from old Fort Ransom, which formerly stood within its limits, and which had been named in honor of General T. E. G. Ransom.

La Moure county, which was named in honor of Hon. Judson La Moure, one of Dakota's prominent old settlers and influential citizens, was created January 4, 1873, from parts of Buffalo and Pembina counties. Twice since then its boundaries have been changed, in 1881 and again in 1883. January 29, 1881, the governor appointed John R. Crum, Homer T. Elliott and Charles H. Potter commissioners to complete the organization. October 27, the same year, this board met in Grand Rapids, which had been selected as the county seat. The following were appointed the first officers of the newly made county: Albert E. Franks, county clerk and register of deeds; C. G. Holcomb, treasurer; C. W. Davis, judge of probate; C. Carpenter, sheriff; George H. Merrifield, coroner; J. W. Stoddard, surveyor; Miss Amy Mamtolle, superintendent of schools; and George D. Crum, county assessor. La Moure, a rising city on the James river, is the county seat.

Pembina county was created by an act of the sixth general assembly, January 9, 1867. Three times since then have its boundaries been readjusted was changed, once in 1871, once in 1873, and again in 1881. At the time of the passage of the act originating the county, it was made to include most of the eastern portion of the state and the county seat was located at Pembina. Charles Cavileer, Joseph Rollett and Charles Grant were the first county commissioners. The county was organized August 12, 1867. John E. Harrison was appointed register of deeds and county clerk; William H. Moorhead, sheriff; James McFetridge, judge of probate, and John Dease, superintendent of public instruction.

This appears to have been the first civil organization in North Dakota excepting the old Pembina county in Minnesota, which ended, so far as North Dakota is concerned, in 1858. Voting precincts were established at this time at St. Joseph, Pembina, Park River, Dead Island (Cavalier county), Poplar Creek (Nelson county), Sheyenne (now Cass and Richland counties). The voting places were at the custom house in Pembina; at the store of A. Gingrass, St. Joseph; at Stump Lake, in Poplar Creek precinct; at Georgetown, in the Sheyenne precinct.

The first term of court was at Pembina in July, 1871. Judge French presided and George I. Foster was clerk. The following were the members of the grand jury for that term: D. M. Moorehead, R. D. George, Peter Ferguson, John F. Robinson, William H. Moorehead, L. E. Guillon, Lucene Geroux, James Hastings, James A. E. Duffie, Frank LaRose, Francis Columbo, John Rivelt, John Anderson, Daniel Olsen, Thomas Clover and Charles Bronson.

Cass county was organized October 27, 1873. William H. Leveret, Jacob Whitman and N. Williams held a meeting at the blacksmith shop of the last named, which stood at the foot of Front street, in Fargo. They organized themselves into a board of county commissioners, of which Mr. Williams was chosen chairman. Terence Martin was appointed county clerk and register of deeds, and John E. Haggart sheriff. Shortly after H. S. Back was appointed county treasurer, and G. J. Keeney, county attorney. The first election, which was held February 14, 1874, resulted in the election of the following officers of the newly organized county: S. V. Hoag, M. Hexom and Ole Hetzgaard, commissioners; Terence Martin, county clerk and register of deeds; P. P. Nokken, county treasurer; John Haggart, sheriff, and N. B. Pinkham, attorney. The question of bonding the county for $15,000 to erect suitable county buildings was also carried. The whole vote cast at that time was 179. The first court house was erected the same year. In the spring of 1883 was commenced the new and more commodious court house. The jail had been completed the previous year.

Barnes county was not organized until 1878, at which time Chris Anderson, Otto Becker and Chris Pacto were appointed county commissioners. The gentlemen met and chose Mr. Anderson as chairman of the board. At its first session the following officers were appointed to fill the various county offices: L. D. Marsh, county clerk and register of deeds; J. S. Weiser, treasurer, and John Morrison, sheriff. At the first election all these gentlemen were chosen to fill the same offices, except that D. D. McFadgen was elected sheriff in place of Mr. Morrison. Valley City, located at the second crossing of the Cheyenne, was designated as the county seat. A fine court house was erected in that place in 1880.

Kidder county dates its organization from 1881. In the spring of that year a board of county commissioners, appointed for that purpose by the governor, met at Steele to perform the duties of their office. They were the following named gentlemen: John W. VanDeusen, W. F. Steele and Frank Whipple. The county seat was located at Steele, and the following were chosen to fill the various offices: D. F. Allison, county clerk and register of deeds; J. D. Thompson, county treasurer, and Leon McLaughlin, sheriff.

Burleigh county, in 1873, contained few, if any, settlers outside of the city of Bismarck, but felt the need of county government. In June of that year a caucus was held, of which E. A. Williams was chairman and Col. C. A. Lounsbury was secretary. The resolution to petition the governor for authority to organize was adopted unanimsly, but on the question of naming the commissioners there was discord. Three factions were developed, and three sets of names were accordingly sent in to the governor for him to appoint as county commissioners to organize the new county. In order to please all, Governor Burbank selected one from each list and appointed the following board: J. P. Dunn, William H. Mercer and James A. Emmons. In July of that year the board met and appointed the following officers of Burleigh county: Daniel Williams, county clerk and register of deeds; J. S. Carvelle, probate judge; John E. Wasson, county attorney, and Major William Woods, sheriff. A regular election was held in the fall of 1873, at which the result was close, but the following were declared elected: E. P. Davis, J. P. Dunn and William Mercer, county commissioners; J. H. Richards, county clerk and register of deeds; W. B. Watson, county treasurer; E. N. Corey, judge of probate, and Alexander McKenzie, sheriff. In 1882 a fine court house was erected.

They met at Mandan, February 25, 1881, and organized by the selection of Mr. Bouleigh to act as chairman. Frank J. Mead was appointed county clerk. On the 17th of March they again met and chose the following named gentlemen to fill the various offices: Frank J. Mead, in addition to his office of county clerk, was made register of deeds; P. M. Cranberry, county treasurer; P. O. Chilstrom, judge of probate; Carlos Mann, assessor; Mrs. F. H. French, county superintendent of instruction, and William A. Carr, sheriff. Mandan was made the county seat.

The organization of Stark county dates from May 25, 1883, when H. L. Dickinson, James Collister and James G. Campbell met for the first time as a board of county commissioners. Mr. Dickinson was chosen chairman. The following officers were appointed at that time: N. C. Lawrence, register of deeds; R. E. Lawrence, treasurer; William Gibson, probate judge; J. L. McKittrick, clerk of courts and William Cushkelly, sheriff. Dickinson, so named in honor of the first chairman of its board of county commissioners, is the county seat. The county was created by act of legislature, February 10, 1879. Its boundaries were changed March 9, 1883, and March 10, 1887. The commissioners above were appointed by the governor, May 1, 1883.

The county of McLean was duly organized November 1, 1883, by commissioners appointed for that purpose by Governor Ordway, October 16, of that year. These gentlemen were: John S. Veeder, Charles T. Martenson and Warner F. Lewis. The board held its first meeting on the date above given at the village of Washburn. On organization, Mr. Veeder was chosen chairman. Washburn was made the county seat, and the following officers were appointed: E. W. Gray, county clerk and register of deeds; James Heath, judge of probate; E. T. Winston, treasurer; John Satterlund,

The county of Grand Forks was created by legislative enactment June 4, 1873, and an abortive attempt was made to organize the county the same year. The governor, John A. Burbank, appointed George B. Winship, O. S. Freeman and Ole Thompson commissioners for the purpose. These gentlemen transacted no business, there not being more than seventy or eighty people living in the county.

In the following year, 1874, the governor appointed D. P. Reeves, Alexander Griggs and George A. Wheeler county commissioners. On the evening of March 2, 1875, these gentlemen met at the residence of Mr. Reeves, at Grand Forks, and proceeded to organize by the election of D. P. Reeves to the position of chairman of the board of commissioners. The county officers, who had been previously selected, came forward with their bonds and were sworn into office. They were as follows: James Elton, register of deeds; Thomas Walsh, treasurer and probate judge; Nicholas Hoffman, sheriff; Thomas Walsh and D. P. Reeves, justices of the peace and George A. Wheeler, superintendent of schools. The other officers appointed did not qualify. Grand Forks is the county seat. At the first election the following named acted as judges of election in various parts of the county: Eric Anderson, Frank Lambert, Knud Rouen, E. B. Andrus, Nels. P. Olsen, George Ames, Thomas C. Campbell, Duncan McMillan and James McCaffrey.

The organization of Walsh county took place in 1881. February 11, of that year, certain territory consisting of the two southernmost rows of townships of Pembina, and the two northernmost rows of Grand Forks townships, were set off from those subdivisions of the state and formed into a new county. To this was given the name it bears in honor of George H. Walsh, of Grand Forks. Governor Ordway July 30, 1881, appointed a board of county commissioners to carry out the organization. This consisted of the following named gentlemen: George P. Harvey, William Code and B. C. Askelson. This board met August 30, 1881, at the residence of George P. Harvey and organized by the election of that gentleman to the position of chairman. The following officers were appointed: N. Upham, county clerk and register of deeds; K. O. Skattehoe, treasurer; E. O. Faulkner, judge of probate; Jacob Remhardt, sheriff; J. N. Nelson, assessor; Eugene Kane, surveyor; R. M. Evans, superintendent of schools, and Dr. H. H. Hamilton, coroner. After several ineffectual attempts to locate the county seat, the towns of Grafton, Minto and Kensington all competing for the honor, finally at a meeting of the board, held September 14, the seat of justice for the new county was located at Grafton.

By an act of the tenth territorial legislature, dated January 4, 1873, a part of Buffalo county was set off and formed into a new county to which was given the name of Rolette, after that early pioneer of the state. The original boundaries of the same were twice changed, once in 1883 and again in 1887. November 6, 1885, the governor appointed as commissioners to organize the new county, the following named: James Maloney, Jasper Jeanotte and Arthur Fousard. The two last mentioned failed to qualify and Fred Schutte and Lemuel M. Melton, of Dunseith, were appointed in their stead. The board so constituted met at Dunseith, which had been selected for the county seat, October 14, 1884, and Fred Schutte was chosen chairman. Courtland P. Clements was appointed register of deeds; James Elton, judge of probate; F. E. Farrell, county superintendent of schools; James D. Eaton, county treasurer; Barney Cain, sheriff; Dr. Stephen Howard, coroner; Gavin Hamilton, county attorney. W. A. McKee succeeded Elton as judge of probate. Thomas Heskett, L. E. Marchaud, Samuel Shreckengast and Philip T. Metler were appointed justices of the peace.

February 10, 1879, was the date of the act creating the new county of Stark from original territory. March 9, 1883, part of it was taken off and added to Hellenger county, and March 10, 1887, its boundaries were again changed. Its organization dates from May 1, 1883, when Horace I. Dickinson, James Collister and James Y. Campbell were appointed commissioners to inaugurate the county government.

Pierce county was created by an act of the general assembly, dated March 11, 1887, from parts of Rolette, Bottineau, and McHenry. February 12, 1889, an election notice was issued from the executive branch of the state government at Bismarck, ordering an election to be held in Pierce county, for the purpose of electing officers to organize the government of that county. The election was held April 11, 1889, at which time were chosen the following officers: George W. Spaul, W. R. Tuff, and H. Hendrickson, county commissioners; Charles A. Erickson, register of deeds F. J. Sikes, sheriff; E. Strommen, assessor; D. P. Thomas, probate judge; C. Evenson, treasurer; Frank Creek, county surveyor; G. W. Sewell, coroner; Isaac M. McBride, superintendent of schools; E. Trueman, D. A. Briggs, and M. Nash, justices of the peace. The first meeting of the county board was held April 16, 1889, at which George W. Spaul was chosen chairman. Rugby is the county seat.

Oliver county is a creation of the legislature, dating from March 12, 1885. It was taken from a part of Mercer county. The same day the governor designated Henry Sawyer, H. E. Fisher and Lewis Connolly as commissioners to proceed with the organization, and Raymond was designated as the county seat.

Logan county formed from a part of Buffalo county, January 4, 1873, had its boundaries changed March 9, 1883, a part of its territory going to McIntosh county. George Lightfoot, J. A. Wise and Edmond R. Weed were appointed by the governor April 17, 1884, for the purpose of its organization.

January 4, 1873, at a session of the tenth general assembly was formed a new county, to which was given the name of Foster. It was formed from a part of Pembina. Several times the original boundaries have been changed, usually reducing its size. September 27, 1883, three commissioners were empowered by the governor to organize the county. These gentlemen were E. W. Brunner, Horace M. Clark and L. R. Casey.

Eddy county was formed from a part of Foster county, March 9, 1885. April 15, of the same year, the following commissioners were appointed by the governor to organize the newly created sub-division: Paul J. Braman, F. J. Dunham and John Prader.

By one of the acts of the thirteenth territorial legislature, passed February 10, 1879, the county of Billings was created. Three times its boundaries have been changed, in 1883, 1885 and in 1887. October 25, 1883, the governor designated a board of commissioners for the purpose of organizing the county. These commissioners were C. E. Haupt, C. A. Boyle and Hugh J. McBirney.

Benson county owes its existence to an act of the general assembly, March 9, 1883. It was formed from parts of Ramsey and DeSmet counties. The original boundary lines of the county have been changed twice, once in 1885, and again in 1887. The county was organized November 6, 1883, at which time the governor selected Hugh McGarvey, M. D. Flint and T. J. Larison as commissioners for the purpose.

Boreman county was created by the tenth general assembly from original territory, January 8, 1873.

Allred county was created by an act of the legislature, March 8, 1883, and was formerly a part of Howard county. Its boundaries were changed by the act of March 10, 1885. Most of this county lies within the lines of Military and Indian reservations, and the balance is unsurveyed and practically unoccupied.

Bowman county, also, was created at the same time from a part of the county of Billings. It has never been organized as a political sub-division of the state.

March 9, 1883, the legislature, from a part of Howard county, created the county of Dunn. Its boundaries were changed by the act of March 10, 1885.

The same act of March 9, 1883, created Hettinger county from a part of Stark.

McKenzie county was also created by the same act of March 9, 1883, from a part of Howard county.

Wallace county was also formed by the same act at the same time.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

The constitution of North Dakota makes ample provision for numerous public institutions. It takes the matter out of the hands of the legislative bodies, and settles their location, thus preventing contests or ill feeling. It locates the capital at Bismarck, the state university and school of mines at Grand Forks, the agricultural college at Fargo, a normal school at Valley City, appropriating fifty thousand acres of land for the latter; the deaf mute asylum and school at Devil's Lake, the reform school at Mandan, a normal school at Mayville, for which twenty thousand acres of land are appropriated, and a hospital for the insane and feeble minded at Jamestown for which twenty thousand acres of land are set apart. It also permanently locates the following institutions: A blind asylum at such place in the county of Pembina as the electors may determine, with a grant of thirty thousand acres of land; an industrial school for manual training, at Ellendale, with a grant of forty thousand acres; a school of forestry at a place in one of the counties of Rolette, Bottineau, McHenry or Ward, as may be determined by the electors, and a scientific school at Wahpeton, with a grant of forty thousand acres. It is also provided that no other institution of a character similar to any one of those located shall be established or maintained without a revision of the constitution.

The educational, benevolent and reformatory institutions of North Dakota are among the best in the land, and reflect great credit upon the people for their broad and liberal methods and expenditures in providing higher educational advantages, and in caring for the defective and criminal classes. Of the latter there are, however, but few, the per centage as to population being less than in any state in the Federal Union. The cause of higher education is cared for by a state university, besides several denominational colleges, to which aid is given in support of normal courses.

STATE CAPITOL.

At the fifteenth session of the territorial legislature, in 1883, a commission was appointed for the purpose of locating the capitol of the territory permanently. To secure the coveted honor the citizens of Bismarck donated one hundred thousand dollars in cash and grounds of three hundred and twenty acres of land largely laid out in town lots, to be sold for the benefit of the territory. The main part of the building only has been erected. The North and south wings to complete the building as planned have yet to be built. It is four stories in height, built of native pressed brick and terra cotta, trimmed with white limestone facings, columns and sills. It is heated throughout by steam. Upon the second floor are located the offices of many of the state officials, among them being the governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and attorney-general. The third floor is taken up by the legislative chamber, which extends upward and includes a portion of the fourth story, and by the offices of the railway commissioners, legislative committee rooms, library and historical collections. The hall in use by the senate is located upon the fourth floor. On the division of the territory and the admission of the state to the Federal Union the capitol, which when finished will be one of the finest edifices in the northwest, became the property of the state of North Dakota.

The report of the capitol commission furnishes the following data concerning the financial status of the capitol building and grounds:

Cash donated by citizens of Bismarck.....	$100,000 00
Cash received from 240 lots sold.....	38,849 00
Total indebtedness, including interest to April 1, 1889.....	83,507 46
Total cost of capitol and grounds, including interest and indebtedness to April 1, 1889....	222,356 46
Unsold lots now owned by state, 749—appraised value.....	85,521 00
The north half of the north half of section 9, township 139, range 80, 160 acres, not valued.
Capitol Park, 20 acres, and buildings, not valued.

PENITENTIARY.

The state penitentiary located at Bismarck, Burleigh county, the state capital, is one of the complete prisons of the country. It is a well-constructed and suitably arranged building of brick, iron, and stone, and contains besides the usual cells, warden's office, departments for guards, officers' and guards' dining hall, chapel, barber shop, kitchen and storeroom. It stands on a tract of forty-three acres, two miles east of the business centre of Bismarck, and cost nearly one hundred thousand dollars. The furnishings and appliances are of the plans adopted by the other states, including steel cells, water works, sewers, laundry and steam-heating apparatus. The prison grounds have been nicely laid out, and several hundred young trees planted, stables, root houses, and other out buildings erected, mostly by prison labor. The prisoners have also been employed in improving the capitol grounds. This is one of the few penitentiaries in the land in which the convicts are not dressed in stripes, and the large number of "trusties"—those on good behavior—and no escapes, indicate that kind treatment is more beneficial, not to say humane, than to subject convicts to harsh and humiliating treatment. May 1, 1883, the territory issued fifty thousand dollars in six per cent. bonds for the construction of the penitentiary. These were to run twenty years or redeemable at the option of the territory at any time after May 1, 1888. May 1, 1889, the state issued twenty-nine thousand dollars in four and one-half per cent. bonds for the improvement of the same institution, which were made payable in 1917, or at the option of the state after May 1, 1897.

HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

This noble institution is located at Jamestown, Stutsman county, and is a model of its kind. The buildings consist of four ward buildings, two for each sex, kitchen buildings, assembly hall, office building and residence, engine house, water tower, barns, etc., and cost over $276,000. Except the barns and stables, all the buildings are substantially erected of brick, on solid stone basements, in the most approved style of modern architecture for hospital purposes, designed with a view to securing the best sanitary conditions, with strict reference to comfort and convenience in the care and treatment of patients. The buildings are all separate and distinct, so that while more room, comfort and privacy is secured between the sexes, any extension may be easily made as needed. The buildings are connected with corridors. In case of fire or epidemic diseases, the advantage of separate buildings is apparent. The buildings are lighted with incandescent electric lights, supplied with water pipes throughout, steam-heating apparatus, and a perfect system of sewerage. It has been the constant aim of the management to have the furnishings perfect and convenient, even to the smallest details. Pictures, musical instruments, flowers and other evidences of refinement and taste are found in profusion. The patients are kept as neat and clean as possible. Their minds are diverted from despondent subjects, and all are cheered and amused and exercised in every reasonable way, which method seems to be the only proper course to pursue with insanity. Many, with this treatment, recover. There is very little, if any, force used, and there are no jail cells or iron bars to give the impression of confinement or prison life. Kindness and cheerfulness, judging from the results here, certainly seem to be the best remedies for unhinged minds.

The location for the hospital is all that can be desired, commanding a view that is unsurpassed for beauty—the varying landscape spread out for miles in every direction—the James river, skirted with timber, winding around the foot of the bluff, with a grand view of the city of Jamestown and the valley of the James for miles around. There is a large farm and garden of about two hundred and fifty acres connected with the institution, enclosed with a neat wire fence, much of the work being done by the patients. All the vegetables used are grown in the garden, and the fields supply all the grain and hay needed for horses and cows.

The average of insanity in North Dakota is much less than in most of the older states. The institute for the benefit of the feeble-minded is a part of this hospital for the insane, it being deemed best to unite under one head these two beneficent asylums.

The Soldiers' Home, located at Lisbon, North

Dakota, is one of the most beautifully situated homes of its kind in the United States, and added to its natural surroundings, the buildings are of modern architectural beauty, and altogether form a comfortable retreat for veteran soldiers. The management of the institution is of the highest order, and everything about the place bespeaks the true spirit of faithfulness in connection with the labors therefor.

The main building of this institution is of Menominee brick, and is 50x80 feet, and was erected at a cost of $18,000. It is finished in native wood, with maple floors, and the architecture is of the best in design and finish. In the present year, 1899, a hospital building has been erected, 35x57, with an L 28x50, built of Menominee brick and stone, with large basement, an elegant and commodious structure. In 1898 a splendid system of water-works was constructed. The water for drinking purposes is obtained from two wells twenty-five feet in depth, the water raised by steam power, while the water for irrigating purposes is obtained from the Shesenne river. The grounds consist of eighty-five acres of land, lying within the corporate limits of the city of Lisbon. The Shesenne river forms the west boundary of the grounds, and on its banks, and surrounding the buildings, is about forty acres of native timber, oak, ash, elm, box elder and fine linden trees. It is a picturesque spot, and suggestive of peace and security.

The bill for the location of the home was introduced in the house February 24, 1890, and in 1891 the land was purchased, and the buildings were soon in course of construction. The home was opened for occupancy August 2, 1893, since which time it has afforded shelter to ninety old soldiers, and at the present time thirty-eight veterans call it home. Colonel William W. McIlvain is commandant of the home, and Mrs. Helen R. McIlvain is matron of the same. To a review of their lives space is devoted in this volume.

William W. McIlvain was born in Champaign county, Ohio, July 15, 1835. He is of Scotch-Irish extraction, and his grandfather, Robert McIlvain, was a pioneer settler of Kentucky. He was captured by the Indians, and was their prisoner in Pennsylvania two years. The father of our subject was a native of Kentucky, and his mother was from Virginia.

While but a young child our subject went with his parents to Cass county, Michigan, where he grew to manhood on a farm, and was educated in Kalamazoo Baptist College. He served during the Kansas border disturbances in 1856 and 1857, and June 20, 1861, enlisted for the Civil war, as corporal of Company D, Sixth Michigan Infantry. He was mustered into the service as sergeant August 20, 1861, and participated at Fort Jackson, St. Phillips and New Orleans, and he was commissioned second lieutenant December 1, 1862, after which followed the battle of Baton Rouge and the siege of Port Hudson. He was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant September 1, 1863.

Returning from the war, Mr. McIlvaine engaged in the merchandise business at Cassopolis, and in 1883 located in Fargo, Dakota, as a special land agent for the United States government. He began farming near Sheldon, in Ransom county, in 1884, and developed a farm comprising eight hundred acres, which place he left to accept his present position.

Our subject was married in 1864 to Miss Helen R. Reed, a native of Cassopolis, Michigan, who was born September 10, 1845. Mrs. McIlvaine was a student of Olivet College, Michigan, and is a lady of culture and rare attainments. She has devoted her life to kindly deeds, and is an able matron and helpmeet of her husband in the great work which they are doing at the Soldiers' Home. Upon the opening of the home Mr. McIlvaine was chosen commandant, and Mrs. McIlvaine matron of the institution, and under their fostering care the institution has been successful and meets the hearty approval of inspectors and is a credit to the state and to the city of Lisbon. The board of directors and those in charge are in hearty co-operation, as a result of which a comfortable, cleanly and peaceful home is afforded the inmates of the institution.

The University and Normal schools are mentioned in their proper place in the chapter on Education and Educational Institutions, to which the reader is referred.

OTHER PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS.

So interwoven are the life histories of the two gentlemen who head North Dakota's remaining notable public institutions with the annals of those communities, that it were but repetition to write of them in this connection, and the reader is respectfully referred to the biographical department of this history. Reference is made to the School for the Deaf and Dumb at Devil's Lake, under the supervision of Prof. D. F. Bangs, and the Agricultural College at Fargo, presided over by Hon. J. H. Worst.

SOME FIRST ITEMS.

The first instrument of any kind recorded in North Dakota was a bill of sale, September 12, 1868, by which Baptiste Gardipee sold to William H. Moorhead four head of horses and an ox for the sum of $563. The second paper filed was one registering his marks for animals, by Charles Cavileer, April 10, 1869.

The third was a contract by which Joseph Rolette covenanted to sell Frank Colombo ten acres of land.

The Pembina land office was opened December 20, 1870, and Charles Cavileer made the first pre-emption entry in North Dakota, and received the first patent for land in the state. Hon. Judson La Moure made the second entry for land, Allegany settlement, October 28, 1870. Entries were made the same day, that of the opening of business at the land office, by seventeen others, among whom were John Hancock, Joseph Rolette, Jr., W. H. Moorhead, Frank Colombo and John Bagley.

Hon. N. E. Nelson made the first homestead entry in North Dakota; Charles Bottineau, the second; Peter Hayden, the third; John McMahan, fourth, and Joshua Park, the fifth.

The first entry of land included in what is now the state was made at the United States land office at Vermillion, June 15, 1868, by Joseph Rolette, Sr. This was the site occupied by the old post, established in 1797, by Peter Grant, and occupied by Captain Henry at the beginning of the century. This historic piece of land, containing about five acres, was purchased January 25, 1871, by James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railroad, and the instrument conveying it was the first warrantee deed recorded of land in the state.

THE PRESS; INTRODUCTORY; FIRST NEWSPAPER; OTHER EARLY NEWSPAPERS.

THE PRESS.

The inception of journalism dates, in its broadest sense, from remote ages. The institution now known as the newspaper was preceded more than a thousand years by manuscript or tablet publications upon which the accounts of public occurrences in Rome were made public. These journals, often official in their origin, were made known by the name of Acta Diurna, which may be freely translated as "Day's Doings." Their issue in the time of scarcity of news or gossip was but irregular, the editor either engaging in some other calling or indulging in the sports of the day.

But little progress was made from this for many centuries. Few of the people, high or low, could read or write, and their interests were confined to the happenings of their immediate vicinity. Prior to 1622, the date of the first publication of anything worthy of the name of newspaper, the mental appetite of the learned of modern Europe had subsisted upon periodical manuscript literature. In England, the written newsletter, furnished only at fabulous prices, was, for a long time, the vogue. This news pamphlet was the nearest approach to the newspaper that had obtained up to 1622, when, as has been said, the first regular series of newspapers was born. This was entitled the "Weekly News from Italie and Germanie." It was printed upon a mechanical contrivance, perfected by Nathaniel Butler, who is the progenitor of the newspaper proper. The first attempt at the publication of parliamentary reports was made in 1641, when the political parties of the realm of Great Britain first occupied a place in the paper. The first advertisement was inserted in 1648, was in verse form, and tradition truly says it paid to advertise then as now.

The first daily morning newspaper was the "London Courant," published in 1709, and consisted of only one page of two columns, each five paragraphs long, and was made up from translations from foreign journals and newsletters. Fifty years from that date had not expired before seven millions of newspapers were sold in England annually.

The revolution in journalism in the present century has been of so stupendous a form as to be almost beyond comprehension. Compare the few hundreds from the Franklin hand-press of the not long ago with the twenty or thirty thousand an hour of perfect newspapers thrown out by the perfecting press of to-day. Contrast the almost absolute paucity of news with the present well-filled columns of the doings in every land upon which the sun shines. The press, too, has increased in power and usefulness, and to-day it stands as one of the most important factors in the upbuilding of the community or state, and the preservation of the rights of all. It is an instrument well calculated to elevate and enlighten the people as well as aid in the enforcement of the laws and perpetuation of good government. It is its mission to hold up to the public gaze the wrong doings or omissions of its public servants, to air the misdeeds of those guilty of crimes against law or society, and to hold up to admiration the great, good or noble deeds of those who are worthy of respectful homage. With the bright searchlight of modern journalism turned upon the life of our public men, how few of their unworthy acts can be hid in oblivion?

The editor in his chair, the reporter in his rounds, each has a share in the great work of enlightening the world. Close at their side, if in fact he be not all three combined, stands the printer. The printer, whose ceaseless placing of type on type makes possible the labor of the brains of men; the printer, who garners up the thoughts and actions of men spreads them upon the blank page and sends them to your very door, is he, too, not worthy a place in history? The poet has well said:

"The printer, and in most cases in the western states he is editor as well, is the adjutant of thought, and thus explains the mystery of the wonderful word, that can kindle a hope as no song can, that can warm the heart as no hope, that word we, with a hand-in-hand warmth in it, for the author and printer are engineers together. Engineers, indeed! When the little Corsican bombarded Cadiz at the distance of five miles it was deemed the very triumph of engineering. But what is that range to this, whereby they bombard the ages yet to come. There at the case the printer stands and marshals into line the forces armed for truth, clothed in immortality and English. And what can be nobler than the equipment of a thought in sterling Saxon, Saxon with the ring of spear on shield in it, and that commissioning it, when we are dead, to move gradually on to the latest syllable of recorded time. This is to win a victory from death, for this has no death in it.

"The printer is called a laborer, and the office he performs, toil. Oh, it is not work, but a sublime rite that he is performing. When he thus sights the engine that is to fling a worded truth in grander curve than missile ever before described, fling it into the bosom of an age as yet unborn. He throws off his coat, indeed, we but wonder, the rather, that he does not put the shoes from off his feet, for the place whereon he stands is holy ground.

"A little song was uttered somewhere, long ago; it wandered through the twilight feebler than a star, it died from the ear. But the printer caught it up where it was lying there in the silence, like a wounded bird, and equips it anew with wings and sends it forth from the ark that has preserved it, and it flew forth into the future with the olive branch of peace, and round the world with melody, like the dawning of a spring morning.

"How the types have built up the broken arches of the bridge of time. How they render the brave utterances beyond the pilgrims audible and eloquent, hardly feeling the free spirit, but moving not a word, not a syllable, lost in the whirl of the world, moving in connected paragraph and period down the lengthening line of years."

FIRST NEWSPAPER.

Previous to the advent of the railroads, the few settlers then in North Dakota were scattered up and down the Red River valley, with here and there, but none gathered into a community large enough to need or support a newspaper. Of the founding of the first paper in the state, the "Bismarck Tribune," the following is a brief account: The Northern Pacific Railroad entered the state crossing the Red river in the spring and summer of 1872, and before the winter's frosts had set in the iron rails were completed to Steele, or "Seventeen Siding," as it was then called. The road from there to the Missouri river was graded most of the way. In April, 1873, Colonel Clement A. Lounsbury, a gallant officer of the Twentieth Michigan Infantry during the Civil war, and at the above time associate editor of the "Minneapolis Tribune," came to Fargo, in the interests of his paper, to write up the salient points of his observation in the country, and to render such services as are generally performed by newspaper men. He was highly pleased with all he saw, and determined to make his home in the rising territory. He then thought to carry out, at once, a plan he and Oscar Wall, then of the "Lanesboro (Minn.) Herald," had agreed upon, that is to establish a paper at the town that must arise when the railroad crossed the Missouri river. With him to determine a plan was to act. He immediately returned to Minneapolis and made preparations for the purchase of the material for the new office, and May 11, 1873, he landed at Bismarck, having come from the end of the railroad line by team. He took out a soldiers' homestead, upon which part of the city was afterward built, and commenced the erection of a building. He, with rare prescience, appreciated the future needs of the coming capital, and when the material for his office arrived it was found that he had provided the outfit for a complete daily paper, including a Taylor cylinder press. These reached the incipient city June 14. On the 6th day of July the first copy of the "Bismarck Tribune," the pioneer newspaper of North Dakota, was issued. It was at that time a seven-column folio, very neatly gotten up, and was run as a weekly until 1881, when it changed to a daily. It has been said of it that it has never missed an issue. In October, 1878, the paper was sold to Stanley Hunter, afterward author of the Spoopendyke papers, but he retained it but a short time, Colonel Lounsbury resuming its ownership in May, 1879. The following article in regard to the pioneer number of the "Tribune" has been gleaned from the "Record," of Fargo, of February and March, 1897:

"Among the advertisements in the first number of the 'Bismarck Tribune,' 'on first page, next to pure reading matter,' was the Exchange saloon, where gentlemen were offered by White & Regan 'choice liquors, wines and cigars, with quiet and tasty quarters and polite attention.' Morton's club rooms were offered for the accommodation of guests. 'All banking games played,' was the conspicuous line. 'The river boys will find in Paul Greene an old-time friend,' was the fly line in the advertisement of the Sazerac saloon. At the Snow Flake, 'Keno every night' was the leading line, and 'Fancy drinks a specialty' took second place. O'Neal & Mullen advertised their concert saloon and dance hall, affording 'choice liquors, fine cigars and pleasant associations,' with 'special attention given to fancy drinks.' H. M. Mixer run the Le Bon Ton, with the assurance that 'this is one of the neatest and coziest club-rooms in the city. J. S. Ward assured his patrons that his billiard hall was roomy and tastily furnished, the liquors of the finest brands, and the cigars the best. M. Tippie simply announced the location of his billiard hall, and himself a dealer in choice wines, liquors and cigars. J. S. Byrnes advertised tobacco, and the Bismarck brewery, with A. Rose proprietor, offered fresh lager beer, equal to anything imported. E. A. Williams, John A. Stayell and Delamater & Beckett were the lawyers. Mrs. Slaughter announced the Bismarck Academy to open July 7. Marshall &

Campbell were in the boot and shoe business. W. B. Shord & Co. took a column to advertise their deposit and exchange bank and general merchandise business. Raymond & Allen were largely represented in their Empire supply store ad. W. A. Simpson was in news and fruit; Clark & Bell, dry goods; Fred Strauss, then, as now, in the jewelry business. Dr. B. F. Slaughter gave a simple announcement as physician and surgeon. R. R. Marsh kept the Capitol Hotel, for even then Bismarck expected to be the capital. J. M. Rosier was the barber. Even W. S. Brown, the express agent, advertised, and all paid good, sound prices. Keating & Wolf advertised fruits and vegetables. Foster & Fagen run the bakery, and D. C. Smith was the photographer. J. A. Emmons was post-trader. F. A. Taylor, of St. Paul, was at Bismarck taking views. Among the advertisements left out of the first number of the Tribune because of the non-arrival of material were S. A. Dickey, post-trader, Fort A. Lincoln; Edwinton Lumber Company; Joseph Barber, gunsmith; Scott & Millett, livery; Asa Fisher, billiard hall; Joseph Deitrich, W. Sparenberg, architects; Archer & Richards, contractors and builders; J. W. Fisher, sewing machines; G. G. Gibbs, blacksmith. McKenzie & Truedell were running a hotel.

"By actual count July 9, 1873, the number of buildings in Bismarck was 147.

"Bismarck was a wild, roaring town in those days. It was an all-night town, quiet during the day, with not a soul in the country engaged in farming. Howbeit, Col. C. A. Lounsbury had broken eleven acres of his soldier's homestead, within what is now the city limits, and had planted it to beans; John Jackman had broken five acres on his claim, also in the city limits, and had planted sod crops; Harry Carnhoof, Mike Smith, Jake Houser and Henry Suttle, J. W. Fisher, Col. Harry Brownson, T. F. Singhiser, and a few others, who had taken claims in the vicinity, had a few acres. Oscar and Henry Ward had claims on Apple Creek, five miles east of Bismarck, where Oscar ran a dairy and supplied the town with milk.

"The Espiranza had come in from Benton loaded with furs. The Perimah, the Far West, Key West and Rosebud were going and coming, and the Stockdale lay at Bismarck.

"There were three infantry companies on the hill at Fort A. Lincoln, which required two hundred men and seven hundred carloads of supplies to construct."

OTHER EARLY NEWSPAPERS.

January 1, 1874, a paper was established at Fargo, under the name of the "Express," of which A. J. Harwood was the editor and proprietor. In a short time it was purchased by E. B. Chambers, who changed the name of the journal to that of "Fargo Times." This paper was afterward absorbed by the "Republican."

In July, 1875, George H. Walsh, who had been publishing the "West St. Paul News," moved his plant to Grand Forks and established the "Plaindealer," and presided over its destinies for two years, when he was succeeded by N. W. Spangler. From then on the paper changed hands quite often.

The "Republican," a weekly journal, was established at Fargo in September, 1878, by Major A. W. Edwards, J. B. Hall and A. W. Hall. A year later Major Edwards severed his connection with the Republican, and November 17, 1879, established the "Daily Argus," the pioneer daily of North Dakota, and still one of the leading papers of the section. In February, 1881, the "Republican" was changed to a daily also.

Among the pioneer papers of North Dakota was the "Jamestown Alert," instituted at that thriving town in the fall of 1878. It issues both daily and weekly editions.

The "Grand Forks Weekly Herald" was first issued June 26, 1879, by George B. Winship, and has had a long and generally prosperous career.

"The Northern Pacific Times" was established at Valley City in 1879 by Dr. S. B. Coe. In June, 1882, formerly connected with the "Pioneer Press," of St. Paul, he purchased the paper and changed its name to the "Valley City Times," and made it a daily.

The "Mandan Daily Pioneer" was established in 1881, by Frank H. Ertel, who afterward, in 1883, sold it to Tuttle & Wilson, and later it passed into the hands of a corporation.

The "Daily News" was instituted at Grand Forks in the spring of 1882, as a morning paper, with Hon. H. C. Hansbrough as editor. Shortly after it was changed to an evening paper and finally discontinued, Mr. Hansbrough removing to Devil's Lake.

The "Jamestown Capital" was first issued February 24, 1882, as a weekly. It was changed to a daily in September of the same year.

The "Mandan Times" began publication on the first day of July, 1882, and announced in its first issue that its politics would be independent Republican.

The publication of the "Dickey County Leader" was commenced by Wesley Moran, the first issue appearing June 2, 1882.

The first issue of the "Ellendale News" appeared May 31, 1883, published by S. C. McDonald.

The "La Moure County Progress," another of the early papers of the state, was established in 1883 by William G. McKean, the first issue appearing June 30.

The first paper published in the German language in North Dakota was undoubtedly the "Pioneer," which was inaugurated at Jamestown in 1883, by A. Stimbach.

These were among the first. To go into detail with each and to speak of every paper would far exceed the limits of this history. Now each town, village or hamlet throughout the wide expanse of North Dakota's fertile plains has its local newspaper, each with a history of its own. The annals of these journals are so interwoven with the life history of their editors that for a more detailed story of their birth, ups and downs and final triumphs, the reader is referred to the biographical department of this work, where will be found the sketches of nearly all the prominent newspaper men in the state.

CHAPTER XI.

EDUCATIONAL; THE COMMON SCHOOL; UNIVERSITY AND NORMAL SCHOOL.

In no other country in the world do education and educational matters assume the importance that they do in the United States. When the stern and rugged Puritan landed on the bleak and inhospitable shores of New England, upon which he sought an asylum where, to use his own words, he "could worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience," he brought with him, besides the light of religious liberty, the seed of our noble educational system. Scarce had he erected his church altar than he began to make preparation for the instruction of the rising generation. Laws, among the first made by that little community on Massachusetts soil, were for the institution and government of the common school. With the growth of years, as our country has expanded, so has the school system become greater, until now there is no state in the union but has made more or less ample provision for the instruction of its youth, not only in its humbler form, but in the walks of higher education.

In this respect the state of North Dakota is, in no respect, behind any of the older states. Investigation into the facts and figures relative to the growth of the school system of the state will convince the most skeptical that few of the states have encouraged education to a greater degree. A very able article written by the governor of the territory, L. K. Church, in a communication with the department of the interior, in 1887, gives the statistics for that year. This, of course, was for the whole territory, before the division.

The governor commenced by showing that the enrollment of scholars in the school, which was in 1875, 4,428, out of a total of school age in the territory of 8,343, had increased to 87,131 out of a total of 109,475 in 1887. The whole number of teachers employed in 1875 was 208; in 1887 they numbered 4,924. The value of school property in 1875 was $24,926, while in 1887 it had risen to the magnificent sum of $3,265,590. The expenditures for school purposes for the two years were, respectively, $32,603 and $1,633,561. The governor goes on to say:

"This shows somewhat the remarkable growth made by Dakota and her school system during the twelve years, beginning with 1875 and ending with 1887. Not only do these figures show a vast increase in the school population and a consequent increase in the number enrolled, but it shows that in proportion to the whole number, a larger per cent. of the children are enrolled in the schools; and further, that those enrolled are attending more regularly than in the fore part of the period covered by these statistics. In 1875 only 53 per cent. of the children of school age were enrolled in the schools, and the same per cent. in 1879. In 1883 the per cent. had increased to 62, while the report of 1887 shows that 79 per cent. of the school population attended school for the whole or a part of the year. During the year 1879 only 25 per cent. of the school population were in regular attendance at school. The per cent. of the population attending regularly in 1883 increased to 37, while in 1887 we make the magnificent showing of 53 per cent. attending every day for the whole term of 112 days. In this respect Dakota leads nearly all of the states.

"The whole number of teachers has increased from 208, in 1875, to 4,924, in 1887, but the average wages, for the same period, shows a slight decrease for the male teachers, while the wages of the female teachers has increased from $25 in 1875 to $30.36 in 1887.

"The school population multiplied thirteen times during the period from 1875, and at the same time the number of schools multiplied twenty times. In 1875 there was one school for every forty pupils of school age, and in 1887 there is one school for every twenty-eight of the children of school age. These figures explain in part the more general and regular attendance during the last years of the period, but only in part. Much of the increase in the attendance is doubtless due to the increase in the wealth of the people. Many parents in the early days were compelled to keep their children at home to work in the various capacities on the farm. The steady prosperity of these years has given many more of the comforts of life, and has enabled parents not only to do without the services of the children, but to provide them with books and clothing necessary to attend the schools. The real object and best results of the public school will be more nearly realized in that community where the largest proportion of the population comes most directly under the influence of the school. In these items Dakota bears comparison with any of the older states of the east, which surely argues that she has accomplished much in the few years since the organization of her school system."

In the official report of P. F. McClure, commissioner of emigration of the territory in 1887, that gentleman says:

"Probably no state or territory in the union has had such a remarkable growth as Dakota. Surely, none has accomplished so much in the same length of time; indeed, many have not achieved such headway in a far longer period. What we have done is shown in our growth; what we are is best shown in comparison with other states.

"In school population, Dakota leads Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Nevada, New Hampshire, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and all the territories.

"In the number of her teachers, Dakota is ahead of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, Nevada, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont and West Virginia.

"Dakota has more days of school than Colorado, Florida, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, West Virginia or any of the territories, except Arizona and Utah.

"In the value of her school property, Dakota exceeds all the states and territories except California, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin.

"In the amount of expenditures for the support of the public schools, Dakota is in the lead of the same list, including Connecticut.

"But it is in the proportion of her children enrolled that Dakota stands most favorable comparison. Upon careful comparison with the reports of the other states and territories for 1885, it is found that Connecticut, Florida, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Hampshire and Rhode Island are the only states that show a larger proportion of their children enrolled in the public schools. Many of them are far below Dakota in this most important particular. With the exception of the states of Connecticut, Florida, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nevada and New Hampshire, Dakota leads the van in the proportion of pupils enrolled that attend regularly.

"When it is considered that Dakota's population is scattered over such a wide area, that she is supposed to be more unfavorably situated as to her climate, and that her soil has, until a few years ago, been considered useless in maintaining civilized life—this feature of the report is, perhaps, the most surprising to those unfamiliar with the work of education in this territory, and the most satisfactory to those interested in the educational progress of Dakota.

"These are statements the people have a right to be proud of, and the more so when it is understood that every dollar of the school fund is raised by a direct tax, there being no fund available from the disposal of school lands until after statehood is attained."

The potency of the country school for good, and its influence as a factor in our stirring national life, were duly recognized by the general government when bestowing statehood upon North Dakota. By the enabling act that brought within the sisterhood of states that vigorous young commonwealth, it was endowed with half a million of acres of land lying within its borders, in addition to the regular school sections, 16 and 36, in every congressional township within the state, and five per cent of the proceeds of the sale of all public lands in the state. This was given exclusively for the cause of education. From these sources has arisen a fund which, by constitutional provision, cannot be diverted from the benefit of the schools. The interest arising from it is apportioned annually among the various districts, but the principal, protected by sufficient safeguards, must remain forever untouched.

The amount of this fund invested in farm mortgages, district school bonds and state bonds on June 30, 1898, was $688,774.19, and the cash on hand at that time was $109,506.25. The amount of money paid to the various districts from the state tuition fund for the years 1894-98 is as follows: For 1894, $317,564.74; for 1895, $366,258.56; for 1896, $308,514.74; for 1897, $400,748.64; for 1898, $412,288.72. The fund is increasing more rapidly than the population, and there are now schools in the state whose running expenses are entirely paid by the money received from this fund.

The following exhaustive and able article relating to the phenomenally rapid growth of the schools of North Dakota was written by Professor Merrifield, of the university, and published in the Grand Forks "Daily Herald" of June 27, 1899. It is worthy of a close perusal and of preservation.

"North Dakota was admitted to statehood November 3, 1889. Few people realize how rapid has been her progress along educational lines in the nine years intervening. June 30, 1889, the total enrollment in our public schools was 30,024; June 30, 1898, it was 67,376, an increase in the nine years of 142 per cent, as compared with an increase of 109 per cent in Idaho (the state making the next largest gain), 71 per cent in Colorado, 61 per cent in Montana, 41 per cent in Washington, 33 per cent in Minnesota, and 14 per cent in South Dakota. During the same period there was a falling off in the school enrollment in Maine, Vermont, Kansas and Nevada, ranging from a loss of 1 per cent in Vermont to 8 per cent in Kansas. Between June 30, 1889, and June 30, 1898, the number of school districts in this state increased from 927 to 1,177; the number of graded schools, from 38 to 113; the number of schools of all kinds, from 1,470 to 2,333; the number of school buildings, from 1,401 to 2,304, with an increase in value from $1,209,228 to $2,132,738. In 1889 the average daily attendance was 16,156; in 1898, 41,155. In 1889 the aggregate days of attendance were 1,915,370; in 1898 (and these statistics are most significant as indicating the increase in length of the school year, as well as of the numbers in attendance), 6,295,751. In 1889; 1,884 teachers were employed, at a total salary of $309,213.94; in 1898, 3,637 teachers were employed, at a total salary of $680,175.36. The total expenditure for all purposes was, in 1889, $596,680.97; in 1898, $1,385,934.17. The number of districts having six months or more of school was, in 1889, 927; in 1898, 1,676.

"That the standard of scholarship has kept pace with the increase in enrollment and the improvement in material equipment is evidenced by the fact that in 1889 the number of pupils in the state studying civil government was 449; in 1898, 20,110; the number studying algebra at the two dates were 202 and 1,123, respectively; geometry, 54 and 714; natural philosophy, 52 and 494; Latin (none reported) and 359.

"In 1889 no high school in the state prepared students for the freshman class of the state university. In 1898 there were nine schools which afforded such preparation. Prior to 1891, the high schools had no common course of study and no coordinating central authority. In October, 1891, the ' Fargo conference ' of high school principals and county superintendents, with the endorsement of the state association at its meeting the following December, agreed to adopt the so-called Minnesota plan of examination and inspection of high schools. The essential features of this plan, including a high school board composed of the governor of the state, the superintendent of public instruction and the president of the state university, were embodied in law in 1895, and at the recent session of the legislature a standing appropriation of $4,000 a year was made for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the high school board and for giving a small annual grant to the classified high schools, thereby making them free of tuition to all pupils resident in the state. Under this plan, at two appointed times each year (the third week in December and May) the examiner sends to the several schools questions in all the branches prescribed by the high school board. The examination is conducted by the principals in accordance with prescribed rules, strict compliance with which is certified by the principals, and the written papers are then sent to the examiner to be read under his supervision. Certificates, which are accepted in lieu of entrance examinations by all colleges in the state, and by most, if not all, colleges in the country, are in due time sent by the examiner to the successful examinees. Under this system an open highway is provided for every pupil in the remotest district school in the state up to and through the state university. By the recent act of the legislature, North Dakota has made education, in all its grades, absolutely free to every child within its borders. With the exception of Minnesota, it is safe to say that North Dakota possesses the most completely developed system of public instruction of any state in the Union.

"Twenty-one schools in the state have been classified by the high school board as state high schools. Seven of these (Casselton, Devil's Lake, Grafton, Grand Forks, Larimore, Lisbon, Valley City,) are classified as high schools of the first class; seven (Bathgate, Bismarck, Drayton, Ellendale, Hillsboro, Oakes, Park River) as high schools of the second class, and six (Buffalo, Langdon, Mandan, Pembina, St. Thomas, Thompson,) as high schools of the third class. High schools of the first class maintain a four-years' course of study prescribed by the high school board; high schools of the second class, a three-years' course, and high schools of the third class a two-years' course. With the exception of Greek, for which substitutes in literature, mathematics and science are offered, this course is substantially the same in quantity and quality as that pursued by the best high schools and academies of the New England and Middle states.

"The institutions of higher learning have not lagged behind the other grades of schools in the general progress. Indeed, they have from the start, set the pace, with the glad consent and cheerful cooperation of the other grades.

"In 1889 the university was the only institution of higher learning in actual operation in the state, with a faculty of ten members and an enrollment of one hundred and fifty-one students, all but twenty-four of whom were in the preparatory department.

In 1898 there were four state educational institutions (the State University at Grand Forks, the State Agricultural College at Fargo, and the state Normal schools at Mayville and Valley City and the two denominational colleges (the Congregational College at Fargo and the Red River Valley—Methodist—at Wahpeton), with a combined faculty of sixty-three members and with nearly or quite one thousand students in attendance.

"During the past term the university registered about three hundred students, considerably more than one-third of them in the college department, eleven being in the graduate department as candidates for the master's degrees. Next October the university will open a law department with a sufficient attendance already pledged to assure the success of the school. The higher and secondary, as well as the common schools, are all in a most flourishing condition, the only complaint from any quarter being that present facilities are proving entirely inadequate to meet the demands made upon them.

"It does not come within the proper scope of this article to make any estimate of the population of the state, based upon the present school enrollment; but as current estimates are all considerably below the population which should belong to us as judged by the ratio per centage (the per cent., that is, that the school enrollment bears to the total population), elsewhere considered conservative. I venture to touch upon the subject in closing my article. Taking as the basis of our calculation the enrollment for the school year ending June 30, 1898, 67,376, and using as our ratio percentage 16.8, which was correct for 1890, we get 401,047 as the present population. This is undoubtedly too large, as the proportion of school enrollment to total population is much larger than in 1890. If we take the ratio percentage given by the United States commissioner of education for North Dakota in 1896, viz: 18.8, we get as our present population, 358,033. Using 22.19, the official ratio per centage of the North Central division of states (including North Dakota), we get 303,600; and using the official ratio percentage for the country at large, 20.37, we get 330,761. All these calculations indicate a population considerably larger than that estimated by the governor of the state and reported to the World Almanac for 1899, viz: 235,000. Assuming the correctness of our school enrollment, I believe a conservative estimate would place our population in excess of 300,000 June 30, last.

"WEBSTER MERRIFIELD,

"President University North Dakota."

THE STATE UNIVERSITY.

The State University of North Dakota was established by an act of the legislative assembly of the territory of Dakota, approved February 27, 1883. The institution was first opened for the reception of students, September 8, 1884. By the division of the territory and the admission of North Dakota as a state in 1889, the institution became the State University of the new commonwealth. By the terms of the enabling act of congress, under which the state was admitted, the university was given a grant of 126,080 acres of public land. This land may not be sold for less than ten dollars an acre, so that the university will eventually have a permanent endowment, guaranteed by the state, of more than a million and a quarter of dollars. The university is supported by appropriations made biennially by the state legislature. At the fifth session of the legislature in 1892, the university was given a permanent appropriation of two-fifths of a mill on the assessed valuation of the state. As this assessment is now in excess of $101,000,000 and is rapidly increasing the university receives about $40,000 a year, and a sum which will increase with each year hereafter. As the growth of the university is fully keeping pace with the growth of the state the increasing income of the university will not more than supply its rapidly increasing needs.

STATE UNIVERSITY.

The University is located at Grand Forks and is a source of justifiable pride to the people of the whole state.

The main building is of brick and stone, and is 51x150 feet in dimensions, four stories high, including basement. All the work of instruction, except in the law department, is carried on in this building, which contains in addition to the lecture and recitation rooms, the chapel, the library, with 6,500 well selected volumes, a well supplied museum, and the biological, chemical, and physical laboratories.

Davis Hall, a well furnished and commodious dormitory is for the accommodation of about one hundred young ladies. All students residing at the university take their meals in the dining hall in the basement of this building. This hall affords accommodations for about two hundred students.

A combined drill room and dormitory furnishes accommodations for about eighty young men. The gymnasium and a dormitory are combined. This building accommodates about forty or fifty students, mainly in the preparatory department. The buildings are all heated with steam and lighted by electricity, all in the most approved modern and scientific manner.

A dormitory and gymnasium are combined in another building. This accommodates about forty-five students and is occupied mainly by young men in the preparatory department.

A building is now in progress of erection, for the general heating and lighting of the institution. The buildings will all be heated in the most approved fashion by steam and lighted by electricity.

The dormitories are all in charge of resident instructors and the morals and health of the students are at all times carefully looked after. The university maintains two hospital wards of ample capacity under the direction of a resident nurse.

The charter of the university provides for the following colleges:

1. The college or department of arts.
2. The college or department of science.
3. The normal college or department.
4. The school of mines, the object of which shall be to furnish facilities for the education of such persons as may desire to receive instruction in chemistry, metallurgy, mineralogy, geology, mining, milling and engineering.
5. The military department or school, the object of which shall be to instruct and train students in the manual of arms and such military maneuvers and tactics as are taught in military colleges.
6. Such professional or other colleges or departments as now are, or may, from time to time, be added thereto, or connected therewith.

Under the provisions of this section of the charter the following departments have thus far been established: Department of arts, department of science, normal department, department of mines and mining, military department, and department of law.

Under the departments of arts and science three courses of study of four years each are maintained, as follows: The classical course, the Latin-science course, and the science course. These all lead to the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Supplementary to these courses there are maintained a graduate course of one year for resident graduates of this institution and of other institutions approved by the faculty, and of two years for graduates of this institution studying in absentia. This course leads to the degree of master of arts.

The course in the normal college covers two years or five years including an elementary normal course of three years.

A diploma from the normal department is the equivalent for two years, without examination, of a first grade certificate in any county in the state. Graduates of this department, after one year's successful experience in teaching, may be granted the state normal certificate, valid for five years, without further examination; after three years' experience they may be granted the professional certificate, valid for life.

As adjuncts to the departments named above the university maintains a preparatory department of three years, embracing the high school course of study prescribed by the state board.

The law department was opened in the fall of 1899, with Hon. Guy C. H. Corliss, formerly chief justice of the state supreme court, as dean. His assistant was John E. Blair, late of Harvard Law School, in 1898. Course in law covers two years, and degrees will be conferred on all completing the course.

The government of the university is vested in a board of trustees, five in number, who hold office for a term of four years each. The work of instruction is entrusted to the faculty of the several colleges. The officers of the university are as follows:

President of the board of trustees, Hon. David Bartlett, Cooperstown; secretary, Prof. Joseph Kennedy, University.

President of the University—Webster Merrifield, University.

Secretary of the Academic Faculty—Prof. John Macnie, University.

Director of the School of Mines—Prof. E. J. Babcock, University.

Dean of the Law School—Hon. Guy C. H. Corliss, Grand Forks.

Secretary of the Law School—Mr. John E. Blair, Grand Forks.

The professors and instructors in all departments number thirty-seven members.

CHAPTER XII.

RAILROADS;

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD; GREAT NORTHERN RAILROAD;
MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL & SAULT SAINTE MARIE RAILROAD;
CHICAGO & NORTH-WESTERN RAILROAD;
CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILROAD.

Toward the upbuilding of a country, toward its settlement and development, there is no more important factor than the railroad. In the 'fifties, and even in the early 'sixties, the railroad was ever prone to follow the paths of civilization and settlement, but now and for twenty years they have led the van. In those days they awaited the results of the efforts of the hardy pioneer, and only sought to run their lines where a heavy traffic and a successful business seemed assured. Prior to this, the going out into a new country meant greater hardships than those of the present day dream of, and the breaking up and development of any new country is hard enough at any time. Without the railroad the greater part of North Dakota would have remained as wild and uncultivated as it was when first the white race beheld its vast expanse, for at least many years. With out the help of railroads it would have taken scores of years to have placed the state where it is today, yea, probably a hundred years. The influence on and importance to the state of the iron horse has been most wonderful.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

One of the earliest and prominent railroads of the state, the Northern Pacific Railroad, which stretches like an iron band from Duluth, on Lake Superior, and St. Paul, on the Mississippi, across the continent, to the waters of the Pacific ocean, on Puget Sound. The principal points on this line in North Dakota are Fargo, Jamestown, Bismarck and Wahpeton. Such considerable places and county seats as Casselton, Valley City, Steele, Mandan, Lisbon, La Moure, Cooperstown, Carrington, Minnewaukon and Leeds, are also on this road, or on some of its branches.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The following history of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was written by General James H. Baker, who, at the time of writing, was state railway commissioner of Minnesota, and who was fully informed upon the subject matter. He says:

"It has been said that the highways of nations are the measures of their civilization. By means of speedy transit, society, government, commerce, art, wealth, intelligence, are developed and advanced to their highest excellence. The thirty-one roads which radiated from the Roman forum into her vast provinces, like spokes from the nave of a wheel, were proof of the wisdom and grandeur of the Roman rule. The historian who chronicles the steps of civilization must tell of the substitution of turnpikes for muddy lanes, of steel rails for the macadam. In the pre-railway times of England, tonnage by earth roads averaged twenty-six cents per ton per mile. The railways came and carried a ton of goods twenty-five miles an hour for two cents per mile. The value of a wagon load of wheat is totally consumed in hauling it on the earth road three hundred miles. The United States, with 112,000 miles of railway, is the foremost nation in the world in the abundance and excellence of her highways. The locomotive and steel rail is the swift civilizer of the wilderness. There are between Lake Superior and the bright waters of Puget Sound 500,000 square miles of rich territory, ready to be impressed with the prosperity, wealth and civilization of the East. A national railway could alone insure that development in this generation. One, and even two lines, were not sufficient to meet the requirements of the situation.

"The center and south were already supplied—the line of the northern zone alone remained or completion. It is the true commercial zone. Behind it lie the active wealth, the commercial power, and the marts of commerce of this nation. New York, Boston, Chicago, the great lakes, the great lines of railway, the growing cities and power of the Northwest, all the great motive forces of the new world, are on the line of this commercial zone. These forces await the opening of this line to pour through its arterial way the tides of wealth and trade. It is backed by all the commercial powers of the age. The northern route was the only original plan of a railway to the Pacific. The waters of the great lake were assumed as its necessary base, and the convexity of the earth gave it vastly the shorter line. Nature had depressed the very mountains themselves for its passage, while the Columbia river and the archipelago of Puget sound seemed to be planned for its Pacific terminus. In the fullness of time, and upon its own merits, this stupendous work has been accomplished. It is of permanent interest to trace the rise and growth of so great an artery of national and international commercial life, which also insures commercial supremacy to our own state. I purpose, therefore, to present the essential outline of its history from its inception to its completion.

"To Dr. Hartwell Carver belongs the honor of being the first person who first conceived and publicly advocated building a railway across the American continent, to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific ocean. In 1837 he began to advocate its feasibility in the newspapers. His first article appeared in the New York 'Courier and Enquirer,' for the insertion of which he paid the sum of fourteen dollars. At that time he was regarded as a Utopian project. His newspaper article, his memorial to congress and his pamphlet, are before me as I write. They evince unbounded faith in the scheme, but the methods proposed there are wholly impracticable. In 1845 he published an Inquiry into the Practicability and Benefits of a Railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean. In 1848 he memorialized congress for a private charter for himself and his friends, and based his claim as 'first inceptor of the project.' His grandfather was that Jonathan Carver who explored a portion of the wilderness of Minnesota in 1764, and whose valuable contributions to the history of the country have been justly remembered by naming a county and town in this state in his honor. He himself claimed to 'hail from the far Northwest, the Falls of St. Anthony, which,' he says, 'I call my present and future home.' His home, however, appears to have been in Monroe county, New York, at which place his communications and memorials were dated. Dr. Carver claims that the first suggestion of a railroad across the Rocky Mountains occurred to him while in Europe, in 1832, in passing from Milan to Switzerland, while crossing the Alps by the Simplon road, built by Napoleon. The peculiarity of Carver's project, like that of all others at an early date, was to connect the great northern lakes with the Pacific ocean, at Puget sound or the Columbia river.

"In the year 1845 Asa Whitney began to direct public attention to and revive interest in a railway to the Pacific. He was a merchant in New York and had spent many years in China. He made numerous speeches through the country, wrote newspaper articles and published numerous pamphlets upon the subject. His scheme was to build it by means of the public lands based on a system of European emigration. His enthusiasm and practical plans enlisted some of the best men in the country in the project. His celebrated meeting at the Tabernacle, in New York, January 4, 1847, was taken possession of by a mob, who declared the project a swindle planned by a band of conspirators to rob the government of its lands. He died in Washington in 1872.

"Many grotesque and extravagant notions concerning a railway to the Pacific characterized the earlier years of its history. Notable among these were Carver's extravagant ideas concerning the prodigious cars of two hundred feet in length he proposed to run; to build great arches over the rivers after the manner of the Romans, and to have a gauge of eight feet wide. Perham had an idea that he could get a million of men to take $100,000 stock each in the road and thus secure the $100,000,000 necessary to build it. Another scheme was to have a system of European immigration which should buy the lands for work upon the road, and thus secure the building as the line was settled. Another fancy was that the excavations of the road through the mountains would develop enough gold and silver to pay for the road. Memorable, too, were the extravagant orations of Delegate Garfield, of Oregon, in congress and on the stump. He portrayed the mild climate of the country in glowing colors, and declared that the winds from the Japan current would follow the building of the road and make a banana belt from Puget sound to Lake Superior. It is well enough to note these early humors, which equal Proctor Knott's famous hyperbolic oration.

In 1854 Edwin F. Johnson, of Middletown, Connecticut, published a book, with a map, advocating the claim of the 'Northern Route' to the Pacific. The question of some railway across the continent was at that time admitted to be of transcendent importance, and the public mind was much divided as to which was the best. Three routes were proposed; one terminating at San Diego; the middle one at San Francisco, and the northern at the Strait of San Juan de Fuca, on Puget Sound. Mr. Johnson advocated, with great minutia of detail and marked ability, the northern route. His laborious investigations covered every point in the controversy, and his analysis of the whole subject was so complete that but little has since been added, except by the result of trial surveys and actual location. Mr. Johnson subsequently served as chief engineer of the enterprise. Under his careful hand the project was no longer a visionary scheme.

"The public mind having persistently urged the necessity of such a national highway, congress finally passed the act of March 3, 1853, which directed that the secretary of war should cause to be surveyed, by army engineers, the western country 'to ascertain the most practical route from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean.' Jefferson Davis, then secretary of war, designated the several chiefs charged with the surveys, on or near the several parallels of latitude. These surveys were all successfully conducted, except that under Captain Gunnison on the line of the thirty-eighth parallel. He, together with thirteen of his men, were massacred by the Indians in October, 1853. The northern route was in charge of Governor I. I. Stevens, of Washington territory, one of the most intelligent, indefatigable and useful friends of the great enterprise. Among his assistants we find such familiar names as Lieutenant George B. McClellan and Captain John Pope. Governor Stevens' survey fully established, not only the feasibility, but the superiority of the route from the Missouri river to Puget sound. The route east of the Rocky mountains, starting at St. Paul, would have been surveyed by Governor Stevens, but his plans were interdicted by Secretary Davis, who was not disposed to give the northern route the chance in public favor its merits demanded. Governor Stevens' elaborate reports settled two important points—that the passes of the mountains were feasible, and there would be no obstructions from snow.

"An intelligent public opinion continued to press the construction of a transcontinental railway. Men of force and character were giving the enterprise support. The people expected it; the time was ripe for its initiation. A serried girdle of railways was already half way across the continent to the Mississippi river, and the pressure of social and commercial forces demanded their extension to our Pacific possessions. The discovery of gold, the defiant conduct of the residents of Utah and the requirements of the war department in Indian matters all combined to quicken the public desire. But the war came, both to delay and expedite the colossal work. The great central route and its auxiliaries were born in the darkness of the nation's struggle, largely as a war measure, to reach and bind our Pacific possessions more closely to the union. This great work was finished May 10, 1869, at Promontory Point, Utah.

"The people of Minnesota and the citizens of St. Paul were among the earliest and most persistent advocates of a Northern Pacific route. Meetings were held, information was gathered, and energetic efforts made through a series of years in its behalf. Among others, a remarkable meeting was held in St. Paul, July 10, 1857, of which Colonel William Noble was chairman and Joseph A. Wheelock, secretary. It was addressed by Governor Ramsey and James W. Taylor. Mr. Taylor's address was a very full and intelligent view of the whole question. The resolutions he offered were remarkably terse and vigorous, one of which is as follows: 'Resolved, That the great physical feat will vindicate itself—namely, that the commerce and power of the globe lies north of the fortieth degree of north latitude and that four-fifths of Europe, with a corresponding area of the Pacific coast of North America, is north of the center of Minnesota.' Upon the basis of this comprehensive idea, the civil engineer of St. Paul, Charles A. F. Morris, made a large map of that zone of the world, representing that idea and defining the line of the proposed road. That map is still in existence, and it is a remarkable presentation of the grand idea it embodies. Through all the years of its varying fortunes, the city of St. Paul, the people of Minnesota and her representatives in congress were the faithful and unwearied advocates of the route, and contributed valuable facts and information in aid of the project.

"Josiah Perham, the first president of the Northern Pacific, was a marked character. Of a speculative turn of mind, he was given to ideal schemes. He was the author of the gift enterprises of twenty-five years ago. A resident of the state of Maine, at an early date he badgered the legislature of that state into granting him and his associates a charter for a railroad from Maine to the Pacific ocean. Of course it was worthless, but he came to Washington with his People's Pacific Railroad Company charter in his pocket, and on the 16th of April, 1870, petitioned congress for the right of way and grant of lands in aid of his pet project. Among others at Washington he encountered Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, then, as ever, a friend of the northern route to the Pacific. Stevens induced Perham to abandon his Maine charter and get up a congressional bill for a Northern Pacific road. At that time Huntington and others were busy with the Union Pacific scheme. Stevens was the chairman of the Pacific railway committee in the house. He introduced a resolution into that committee proposing a northern line contemporaneously with the other proposed Pacific routes. The resolution passed. The result of it was a bill. This bill went to the house and was defeated by eighteen votes. Stevens was angry. As chairman of the committee he held the key to the situation. He plainly told Huntington and his friends that they had permitted the defeat of the measure. It is said that he further told them that he should hold their bill in his pocket till the Northern Pacific bill passed. The result was that the bill subsequently passed the house. It never was printed. It was read perfunctorily as such bills are, and the ten sections per mile were mysteriously increased to twenty. It went to the senate and unanimously passed that body. Perham organized his company; of the stock he had a controlling interest. He failed to accomplish anything and died a poor man. After his death the stock was gathered up, and the enterprise, in new hands, was warmed into new life. Thaddeus Stevens, the old Roman, was the real father of the Northern Pacific charter. Others had advocated the enterprise, but under his sovereign wing the bill had its life.

"On the 2d of July, 1864, Abraham Lincoln signed the charter for the Northern Pacific Railroad. The act of incorporation was reported at the last session of the thirty-eighth congress by the select committee on public lands, of which Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, was chairman, and Ignatius Donnelly the Minnesota member. This charter authorized the construction of a railroad and telegraph line, 'beginning at a point on Lake Superior, in the state of Minnesota, thence westerly by the most eligible route within the territory of the United States on a line north of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude to some point on Puget sound, with a branch in the valley of the Columbia river, to a point at or near Portland, in the state of Oregon.' The charter granted the right of way through the public domain; also alternate sections of land for twenty miles on each side of the road, except mineral lands, upon conditions similar to those contained in other like grants. Some amendments to this charter, relating chiefly to an extension of time, the construction of branches, and the issuing of bonds secured by mortgage, were granted subsequently.

"The valuable, earnest and persistent support of the Minnesota delegation in congress to this great measure must not be forgotten. As early as December 20, 1858, the Hon. H. M. Rice delivered an able speech in the senate in its behalf. January 7, 1859, Hon. James Shields, then a senator from this state, delivered a speech in the same body in its support. On January 5, 1869, Hon. William Windom delivered a very able and extended address in the house in its advocacy. Alexander Ramsey was always conspicuous for earnest efforts in its behalf; so was Hon. Cyrus Aldrich and Hon. Ignatius Donnelly. Indeed, it is very doubtful whether the measure would have succeeded without the patient, intelligent and persistent efforts of the Minnesota delegation in congress. Active, earnest and hopeful, they carried force and conviction in each house, and very largely contributed to its final accomplishment.

"The congressional charter contained a provision creating a representative commission from each state and territory, which should constitute the 'board of commissioners,' and their first meeting was authorized to be held at 'Melodeon hall,' in the city of Boston. In that commission of corporators Minnesota was represented by Cyrus Aldrich, H. M. Rice, John McKusick, H. C. Waite and Stephen Miller. The first meeting of the commissioners was held at Melodeon hall, Boston, September 1, 1864, and they proceeded to elect the first permanent officers, with the following result: President, Josiah Perham; vice-president, Willard Sears; secretary, Abiel Abbott; treasurer, J. H. Withington. Books were ordered opened for subscriptions to the capital stock, and a cash payment thereon of ten per cent. was required. Over 20,000 shares were subscribed and ten dollars per share actually paid in. The secretary thereupon called a meeting of the subscribers to the capital stock, at No. 22 Merchants' Exchange building, Boston, December 6, 1864, for the purpose of electing thirteen directors. The total number of votes cast was 20,073, and the following gentlemen were elected as the first board:

"Josiah Perham, J. S. Withington, A. W. Banfield, Philander Reed, Ogden Holt, Richard B. Sewall, Willard Sears, Abiel Abbott, Nathaniel Greene, Jr., P. J. Forristall, John A. Bass, James M. Beckett and Oliver Frost. On the next day the new officers were elected, with Josiah Perham as president. On the 15th of September, 1864, the act of congress granting lands in aid of the construction of the road was formally accepted by the board and notice of the same served directly upon the president, Abraham Lincoln, who acknowledged the service in a personal letter. Thus the first act in the great drama of a northern railway to the Pacific was accomplished, and the mighty zone, stretching from Lake Superior to that wonderful archipelago, Puget sound, an empire in itself, was to be opened to civilization and the commercial destiny of Minnesota assured. As the railroad so chartered was required to obtain the consent of the legislature of any state through which any portion of it might pass, previous to the commencement of the construction thereof, the legislature of the state of Minnesota passed such an act March 2, 1865, with a proviso that said road should construct a line from the main line to the navigable waters of the Mississippi river. The consent of the state of Wisconsin was given by an act approved April 10, 1865.

"Between the date of organization, 1864, and the year 1869, but little was done. In 1866 J. Gregory Smith, of Vermont, had become president. He was a man of decided ability, energy and perfect faith in the success of the great enterprise. In that year Edwin F. Johnson was appointed engineer-in-chief, and he organized and placed in the field four separate corps of engineers. The measures which had been inaugurated after the organization to provide funds was a failure. Other leading roads to the Pacific were offering better inducements in securities, for they not only had lands and bonds secured by mortgage, and also the bonds of the United States. After an ineffectual struggle to raise funds, application to congress was made December 17, 1867, when Alexander Ramsey presented a memorial to the senate in behalf of the company. For two years, by facts and arguments, congress was urged to subsidize the road, and with the Northern project was now associated a Southern Pacific measure of like import. The enterprise, in different forms, was advocated by some of the foremost men of the nation. The continued discussions were able, but the public mind had become alienated as to subsidies, and even land grants, as a means of assistance, were persistently attacked. The land grant was magnified in importance; it was said to exceed fifty million acres, much larger in empire than the six New England states. Aid to railroads continued to agitate the people with intense feeling. Public opinion was against it, and congress reflected the public will. Appeals for aid were in vain. It became evident that if the Northern continental highway was built at all, it must be constructed on its own merits.

"This condition of things existing, in 1869 the directors proffered to Jay Cooke & Company, of Philadelphia, the financial agency of the company. He had, contemporaneously, been offered the presidency of the Southern Pacific. But on a full examination of the relative merits of the two enterprises he had declined the offer. Before accepting the position of financial sponsor for the Northern line he caused a thorough investigation of the entire route to be made by skillful and trustworthy men.

"On the 1st day of July, 1870, for the purpose of constructing and equipping a line of railroad from a point on Lake Superior to the headwaters of the Missouri, a loan was sought to be effected on the security of a first mortgage bond on all the property of the company, lands included. It had been authorized by a special act of congress, and to give national importance to the instrument it was made of record in the office of the secretary of the interior. The trustees of this mortgage were Jay Cooke and J. Edgar Thompson, president of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company, both of Philadelphia. To the placing of these securities Jay Cooke gave all his ability and experience.

"While negotiations were pending for a loan, Cooke advanced money, and the work was actually begun. On the 15th day of February, 1870, a winter's day, a company coming by sleighs from Duluth, Superior and other points assembled near Thomson Junction to formally break ground. Dr. Thomas Epster, of Duluth, was chosen president and delivered the address. The Rev. George Stutter offered prayer. A number of speeches followed. Colonel J. B. Culver, of Duluth, was appointed to fill the wheelbarrow with dirt, and Hiram Hayes, of Superior, to wheel it. These two cities divided the honors, but quarreled as to the direction it was to be wheeled. This was done amid great cheering. The tools used, presented to the meeting by Captain Starkey, were all sent to Jay Cooke. The 'sacred wheelbarrow' was on exhibition for some time. William Nettleton, Captain James Starkey, Luke Marvin, Colonel Belote, S. G. Sloan and J. J. Egan were the only persons present from St. Paul. Work was not seriously begun until the July following. Captain Starkey was the contractor on the first section. The first spike driven is now in the possession of H. C. Davis, general passenger agent of the Manitoba line. The first engine used was the 'Minnetonka,' the first engineer, Adam Brown; the first conductor, Captain W. B. Spaulding, now of Brainerd; the first brakeman, H. C. Davis; the first fireman, Charles Cotten, now an engineer, and the oldest in the train service of any man at present connected with the road.

"Jay Cooke is the most conspicuous character whose name is connected with the Northern Pacific Railroad enterprise. He was born in Sandusky, Ohio, August 10, 1821. In 1838 he entered the banking house of E. W. Clark & Company, of Philadelphia, and at the early age of twenty-one became a partner. In 1858 he retired from business, but in 1861 he established the great banking firm of Jay Cooke & Company. He became the protege of Salmon P. Chase, then secretary of the treasury, and under the shadow of his great wing Cooke & Company floated and popularized the immense government loans made necessary by the war, and thereby contributed materially to the success of the Union arms. There was something phenomenal in his management of these loans. He succeeded in popularizing them in the darkest days of the war, by methods which were as new to the financial world as were those of Napoleon in the boldness of his military designs. While it was said in Europe that our military campaigns were full of blunders, our financial policy was pronounced a miracle of success. His pamphlet, 'How Our National Debt May Be a National Blessing,' will be remembered. He made the debt 'the orphans' and widows' savings fund.' His method and success constituted an era in the history of American finance. This financial ability, reputation and experience he brought to the great work of placing the loans necessary to the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad. His claim as to the value of these securities and the importance of the road were by many, in that day, deemed chimerical. But time and great results have vindicated the correctness of his judgment and the soundness of his views. It was said to be the dream of Jay Cooke, after the close of the war, to connect his house with the Rothschilds, and thus secure their aid to place the Northern Pacific bonds on the continental market. The war in Europe dissipated that hope.

"On Thursday, the 18th of September, 1873, the banking house of Jay Cooke & Company closed its doors. It was represented by four great banking houses, respectively located in Philadelphia, Washington, New York and the London house, under the control of Hugh McCullough, late secretary of the treasury. The banks were overloaded with railroad securities at the time, and financial circles were imbued with a distrust of Jay Cooke & Company, because of their large connection with the Northern Pacific securities. They had practically become the financial sponsors for the enterprise. The house had made large advances for interest and construction. Europe had not then accepted these securities, as was expected. The failure precipitated Wall street into the throes of panic. The great Chicago and Boston fires were yet fresh in their effects upon the country. The suspension fell like a calamity upon Minnesota. The firm was identified with an enterprise of vital importance to the state. It was felt that Jay Cooke was the only man in America who had the courage to undertake so great an enterprise as the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad across the vast solitudes which stretch from Lake Superior to the Pacific ocean. He had devoted his whole energy and financial skill to the great enterprise, and the hopes and prayers of the great Northwest were with him. But his heroic attempt could not stem the tide of adverse popular distrust. The sale of the bonds at home had been slow, and the efforts to negotiate them abroad were comparatively unsuccessful. The St. Paul and Pacific main line and branches had defaulted in the payment of interest, and as their securities were mainly held in Holland and Germany, the market was prejudiced against any more railroad bonds. An epidemic of distrust generally spread among the holders of the bonds, who began to return them in large amounts to Jay Cooke, who was forced to buy them at par to maintain their credit. In his noble efforts to stay the tide of demoralization, we find the cause which led up to his suspension. He had now fully identified himself with the Northern Pacific enterprise. To consummate this great achievement had become the main purpose of his life, and he pursued his object with generous and heroic ardor. It was an imperial civic ambition. But fortune was adverse, and he fell wounded in the great battle with the forces arrayed against him. His life insurance company and his transcontinental railroad were both ungenerously adjudged mistakes by the financial wiseacres of the day. He was said to be a man of vast ability, but too much controlled by his imagination. It was said that Cooke was notable for asking nobody's advice, and argued things out his own way; that he had organized a raid upon public credulity through the orthodox clergy; that he sought to popularize his bonds through the fictitious boosting of advertising; that his lands were worthless, his road a failure and Duluth a mistake. He lived to see the ungenerous verdict of that day happily reversed. The lands are not worthless, Duluth is not a failure, and his transcontinental railway is an accomplished fact. The securities were just as he represented them, and those who had faith or fortune to hold them have realized dollar for dollar, while others have amassed wealth in exchanging the depreciated bonds for lands.

"To the causes already recited we must add the array of hostile influences which arose from kindred projects. The Union Pacific and its associated enterprises, alarmed at the prospect of the speedy diversion of a greater part of the transcontinental travel and traffic, set up a howl of denunciation of the northern route. They represented the country as sterile and hyperborean. The great cities which participated in interest with the Union and Central Pacific route arrayed every influence which could affect public opinion against the enterprise. They made it the daily subject of malicious abuse and misrepresentation. Jealousy gloated in lampooning and villifying the entire enterprise. Slander did its work in weakening public confidence in the securities. Further south a bitter sectional jealousy prevailed. These combined causes, for the hour, suspended the work and swept Cooke & Company, as by a cyclone, out of the financial world. Sitting in the shadow of his great disaster, Jay Cooke has lived to see his favorite and colossal project arise from the ruins at the call of other leaders, and move forward to its grand accomplishment; and it is pleasant to note that the first great sponsor of the enterprise, at last, from a home of competence, can behold the car of civilization move on its iron way along the northern zone, realizing the full consummation of a purpose which had stirred his more youthful blood.

"The effect of the closing of the banking house of Jay Cooke & Company was temporarily disastrous to the company itself. In its fiscal resources it had leaned wholly upon Jay Cooke. There was a faint hope that some other financial arrangement might at once be made with the properties of the company, and that hope was held out to the public. But it speedily proved delusive. Indeed, some newspapers predicted that the great enterprise would now be finally closed; that it was the explosion of a huge swindle, the bursting of a South Sea bubble. Some of the small-souled newspapers employed themselves by kicking the dead lion, in the person and fortunes of Jay Cooke.

"The explosion found the company, in the fall of 1873, in the possession of about five hundred and fifty completed miles of railroad. Of these, three hundred and fifty extended from Duluth to the Red river at Bismarck, and on the Pacific division one hundred and five miles, extending from Kalama, on the Columbia river, to Tacoma, on the Puget sound. It had earned ten million acres of land. The route had been surveyed entirely across the continent. Settlements were progressing finely. Indeed, all things were progressing favorably when the untoward event of the Cooke failure overtook them. All the company's property of every description being covered by the mortgage, they had no security to offer for a loan. The default in accruing interest was unavoidable. The paralysis of the enterprise was complete.

"George W. Cass had now become president. In their extremity, another appeal, May, 1874, was made to congress. By the conditions of the charter the completion of the road was required by the 4th day of July, 1877. They frankly declared their inability to complete the work. The entire sale of bonds had been over $30,000,000; on these they had realized, net, 83.13 per cent. Nearly the whole amount had been sold or taken by Jay Cooke & Company, under two several contracts. These contracts were terminated and the agency for that company for the Northern Pacific railroad was at an end. The appeal was in vain. Congress adjourned without any definite action.

"The emperors of Russia have not been more determined to reach the Hellespont than the successive dynasties of the Northern Pacific to find a terminus on the Mississippi river. With this purpose in view many schemes were devised. First the purchase of the St. Paul & Pacific, with all its branches, was made in 1872. The Lake Superior & Mississippi (now St. Paul & Duluth) and the Minneapolis to St. Louis were leased. Had they contented themselves with holding and finishing these fine properties, their power and position in Minnesota would have been assured and complete at an early day. What might have been will suggest itself to all. In 1876-77 a second effort was made, and they secured the Western railroad by a lease from Sauk Rapids to Brainerd and by making running arrangements with the Manitoba from Sauk Rapids to St. Paul, thus found access to the Mississippi by a more direct route than by the St. Paul & Duluth. By a third effort, under the masterly effort of Villard, the whole question of reaching the Mississippi and the eastern railway connections at Minneapolis and St. Paul assumed the great importance its merit demands. The Western railroad has been purchased, together with the right of way from Sauk Rapids to Minneapolis lying east of the Manitoba line; and now, by the purchase the right of way, and at least one thousand acres of land in the vicinity of the capital of the state, such final connections and superb terminal facilities are projected as will enable them to give room for all other roads now or hereafter making connections with the great transcontinental line. Like the taking of Richmond, the head of navigation was not reached until the hour and the man had come.

"On the 16th of April, 1875, the United States circuit court of New York appointed a receiver of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and all of its property. The order making this appointment was under proceedings brought by the trustees and the bondholders united. On the 12th of May, 1875, the trustees and bondholders applied for a final decree of sale, which was granted. Under the decree the road and all its property was to be sold for the benefit of the bondholders, who were to become the preferred stockholders. It was an arrangement made between all the parties in interest to avoid litigation and secure the extension of the road. The scheme was devised by a committee of the bondholders, one of which committee was William Windom, of Minnesota, and was adopted June 30, 1875. A committee of six stockholders was appointed to attend the sale and purchase the property for the benefit of those in interest. The judicial sale, under decree of the court, took place August 12, 1875, and was confirmed by decree of the court the 25th of that month. The committee so appointed and purchasing became the body politic and corporate known as the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The holders of the preferred stock were instructed by the committee to meet in the city of New York, September 29, to elect a board of directors. The holders of the common stock, by the agreement, had no right to vote until after July 1, 1878. At said meeting thirteen directors were elected by the preferred stockholders, and subsequently Charles B. Wright was elected president; George Stark, vice-president, and Samuel Wilkinson; secretary. The reorganization was now complete. The bonds had been transferred into preferred stock, and the latter made convertible into lands at par.

"No movement was made that year looking to a renewal of construction. Application was made to congress for an extension of time within which construction might be completed. The twenty-five miles of railroad used by the company between Thompson Junction and Duluth were built by the Lake Superior & Mississippi Railroad Company. To save a duplicate expenditure of money, the Northern Pacific had agreed to pay, for a half interest thereof, $500,000. The greater part of this remained unpaid. After a tedious negotiation, the matter was this year adjusted. The stock of the St. Paul & Pacific came over among the assets of the Northern Pacific; but the whole property had been encumbered by a heavy mortgage and was already in the hands of a receiver, and the property was lost to the new organization. Population was rapidly advancing west of the river, and many thousands of acres of wheat testified to the value of the land grant. Dalrymple, Cheeny, Grandin, and others had opened wheat farms which had become the admiration of the world. The earnings of the road, both gross and net, were highly satisfactory. The intrinsic merits of the route were being made apparent. Preparations were made to run the Dakota division in winter, as the war department had asked this in view of the military situation in the hostile Indian country.

"The year 1877 closed with Charles B. Wright as president, and the other officers remaining as before. The year was signalized by complete success in running trains over the Dakota division in winter, trains on which were delayed less than those on the New York Central road. Thus was dispelled the illusion that Nature had placed an embargo on railroading in those northern latitudes. A remarkable trade was springing up with the territories tributary to the upper Missouri and Yellowstone rivers. Thirty steamboats were plying those waters, connecting at Bismarck with the terminus of the road. The mining developments in the Black Hills had found a convenient outlet at Bismarck, and the numerous military posts and Indian agencies contributed to an increase of business. Thousands of emigrants were flocking to the Red river valley, and the British province of Manitoba was yielding a large percentage to the growing traffic of the road. The most important event of the year was the arrangement made with the Western Railroad Company of Minnesota to complete their line from Brainerd to Sauk Rapids, so as to secure a more direct communication with St. Paul than by the circuitous route of the St. Paul & Duluth. This arrangement was satisfactorily made.

"The delay of congress in extending the time for the completion of the road prevented the company from making any arrangements for the extension of the line into Montana. During this year the Pacific division was extended to the Puyallup coal fields, thirty-one miles.

"The year 1878 was not marked by any very notable event. The officers remained the same. Frederick Billings was chairman of the executive committee, and H. E. Sargent was the general manager. There was a large increase of the local business. Many improvements were made in the road and its equipment. Wheat farming in central Dakota had become very active and profitable. The railroad between Sauk Rapids and St. Paul was controlled by the trustees of the mortgages made by the first division of the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company. Upon the opening of the road from Brainerd to Sauk Rapids, arrangements were entered into with these trustees whereby Northern Pacific trains were run over this road, thus making St. Paul practically one of the terminal points of the line.

"By the resignation of President Wright on account of ill health, Frederick Billings had become president of the company. The financial year was changed from September to June 30. The acreage of wheat along the line in Dakota had doubled, and the quantity of land being taken by settlers was phenomenal. The work of construction had been suspended for six years, and much material had reached the limit of duration, and the work of renewals had become a necessity. Five successive abundant harvests along the line had demonstrated the productive capacity of the soil. A better feeling prevailed. It was now the judgment of the stockholders that construction should be resumed at both ends of the line. A contract was let to Walker, Bellows & Company for one hundred miles from Bismarck, westward. Work was begun in January. The work from the Columbia river, eastward, was also initiated. The great transcontinental enterprise was alive again. The Casselton branch was placed under contract, and the Yellowstone division was also definitely located.

"The year 1880 opened with seven hundred and twenty-two miles of main track actually in operation. An important link of twelve miles, from Ainsworth to Wallula, connected the Pacific division with the road of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company. During the year a system of grain elevators was established along the line from Duluth west. A foreign emigration agency was established in Europe. The company settled down in the belief that their grant of lands remained unimpaired until there was a declaration of forfeiture authorized by congress. The supreme court of the United States avowed this principle, and the executive officers of the government would follow the decision. Hence less interest was felt in the extension asked of congress. This year began the relations between the Northern Pacific and the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, in reference to traffic and joint use of lines. Henry Villard was president of the latter company. Harmonious and mutually advantageous relations were temporarily established between the two companies.

"It has been said that the building east from Ainsworth, and depending upon the precarious navigation of the Columbia river, was a suicidal policy and placed the company wholly at the mercy of a rival line. That rival company soon came into control.

"We approach an epoch which is memorable in the history we record. Under Mr. Billings' vigorous administration the public had resumed faith in the enterprise. This year President Billings completed a sale to a syndicate, consisting of Drexel, Morgan & Company, Winslow, Lanier & Company, and August Belmont & Company, of $40,000,000 of general first mortgage bonds. These bonds speedily became a favorite security. The enterprise flourished, and the work of construction advanced rapidly. In the midst of events, a new power was at work. The hand of Henry Villard was felt. Here begins the close relation which now subsists between the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company and the Oregon & Transcontinental Company and the Northern Pacific. The Transcontinental Company is a consolidation of the steamship companies and the companies owning the railroads to overcome the rapids of the Columbia river. The Transcontinental Company was organized under the laws of Oregon, for the general purpose of constructing railways, and more particularly to secure harmony between the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The progress of the Northern Pacific had now fully invaded the Pacific coast, and was threatening the interests of these rival companies. The Oregon & Transcontinental Company, with Henry Villard as president, and Horace White as secretary, had become rich and powerful. It possessed $30,000,000 of actual capital.

"The glamor of romance surrounds the financial career of this extraordinary man. Henry Villard was born in Speyer, the capital of Rhenish Bavaria, in 1835. His father sat upon the supreme bench of that kingdom. He was educated at the university, and like most of the university students in Germany, was somewhat erratic in his youth. He first came to Belleville, Illinois, where some of his relatives still live. He studied law; yet, like Carl Schurz, he soon adopted journalism as a profession. His first conspicuous task was an engagement to report the celebrated Lincoln-Douglas political discussion. In 1859 he went to Colorado, to write about the new gold discoveries for the 'Cincinnati Commercial.' In 1860 he was doing political correspondence for the 'New York Herald,' and at that time sustaining confidential relations with Mr. Lincoln. He subsequently became conspicuous as a war correspondent. For two years, from 1868 to 1870, he was secretary of the American Social Science Association.

"In person, Mr. Villard is tall and of robust physique. His blue eyes, brown hair, expansive forehead, and fresh, genial face mark the good humor and frankness of the man. He lives on Madison avenue, New York, and has a country house at Dobbs' Ferry. His wife is a daughter of the late William Lloyd Garrison, the great champion of the anti-slavery movement.

"While in Germany, in 1874, events occurred which first brought him in connection with railway affairs. The German bondholders of certain American railway securities, which had defaulted in their interest, sent him to the United States as their representative. In these financial transactions, connected with the Kansas Pacific, he met and successfully encountered Jay Gould. Subsequently, in a vessel fitted out by John Roach, he went around the cape to Oregon to look after the interests of the same friends in the budding railways of that region. He soon mastered the projects and possibilities of those distant provinces, and became himself largely interested in the development of eastern Oregon and Washington territories. He shortly became president of the consolidated railway and navigation companies on the Pacific coast, where he made both reputation and money.

"His success grappled to him as with hooks of steel the capitalists who had been enriched by his genius. In the field of activity, in the prosecution of the interests of his own company, he encountered the Northern Pacific, which was now entering the domain where Villard was established. The first speck of war arose out of the determination of the Northern Pacific to build a line to Portland, on the north side of the Columbia river, and thus crowd out Villard's company, which had proposed to construct a line on the south side of the river. After a fruitless attempt at a compromise of their difficulties, Villard came to New York, and conceived the idea of quietly purchasing, in open market, a controlling interest in the Union Pacific.

"He thereupon organized the celebrated 'blind pool.' This was a daring scheme, in which his friends were asked to place millions of money in his hands for an unknown purpose. No receipt was given. Confidence, perfect trust, was the only basis of the transaction. It is without parallel in the history of financial operations, and bespeaks the implicit trust of his friends in his ability and integrity. Eight millions of dollars were thus put into a 'blind pool.' Northern Pacific stock was quietly bought, and ere the directory was aware, the controlling interest of the line was in the hands of its reputed enemies. It was supposed that the Villard coalition only intended to minify the great transcontinental highway, and use it simply as a feeder for their Oregon properties. The grandeur of the purpose was not yet understood. Alarmed at the situation, well did Billings write Villard, 'Why put a pistol to the breast of the Northern Pacific at Ainsworth and Wallula, and say, thus far and no farther.'

"As a measure of safety, the directory determined to issue $18,000,000 of old stock, to the original parties in interest, in order still to retain their supremacy. There was originally $100,000,000 of capital stock. In the reorganization it was agreed to classify it as follows: $51,000,000 preferred stock to the bondholders, and $49,000,000 common. Of this common, $18,000,000 was yet unissued. Villard immediately brought suit (April 1881), in the supreme court of New York City, to restrain the issue of this $18,000,000. He alleged that the common stock represented nothing, that nothing had ever been paid for it; that the preferred stock was all that was legitimate. Intense interest gathered about the contest. In the midst of it Mr. Billings, who was the largest stockholder in the old regime, seems to have parted with a majority of his stock. The suits were withdrawn, and the Villard combination remained masters of the situation. Mr. Billings resigned the presidency, which was held, temporarily, by A. H. Barney, bridging over the time till the annual election, when Henry Villard was duly installed president, Thomas F. Oakes, vice-president, and Herman Haupt, general manager.

"The history of the closing years of this enterprise would be incomplete without some notice of the man whose marked executive ability has contributed so much to its completion. Thomas Fletcher Oakes was born in the city of Boston, in 1841, and educated in its schools. In 1863 he was in a banker's office in New York. In 1866 he went west with Samuel Hallet, and became purchasing agent for the contractors on the Kansas Pacific, where he remained till the completion of the road, when he was appointed general freight agent of the line, and in 1875 was made general superintendent. About that time Villard was appointed receiver of the road, and thence dates the origin of the connection between the two men. Subsequently Mr. Oakes was made superintendent of the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Gulf Railroad. When Villard had become president of the Consolidated Railway & Navigation Companies in Oregon, he at once secured Mr. Oakes' services as vice-president and general manager of that system and with great vigor and energy he built most of the lines. When the Villard combination had secured control of the Northern Pacific, Mr. Oakes came at once to New York, and was made vice-president and executive manager. To his great ability and energy we are indebted for the marvelous rapidity with which the last eight hundred miles of the line was completed. He is the first executive officer of the road who made the complete overland trip of the line. The superintendency of all detail management belongs to him. Villard devised the general schemes, and Oakes executed the mass of details. The one is the financier, and the other the executive manager. It is a case of Napoleon and his grand marshal, Ney.

"The Oregon & Transcontinental Company was now the principal owner of the stock of all the lines in Washington and Oregon, and of the Northern Pacific besides. Of all the combinations, Henry Villard was the head. The new policy was to be enunciated. It soon became manifest that the Oregon & Transcontinental Company was to be used as a powerful auxiliary in the completion of the Northern Pacific. It at once gave the latter project the strong support of its immense capital, and enabled it to push construction without a moment's halt. It furnished means to build branches, which the Northern Pacific, under the charter, had not the power to do, and thus prevent the encroachment of rival lines. As the controller of the vast traffic of the comprehensive system of railroad, ocean and river lines already developed in Oregon and Washington, it will now compel that aggregation of business through the main artery—the Northern Pacific. In this wider view of the whole matter, it will be seen that the Villard association of companies proves to be of immense value to the nation's northern highway to the Pacific. It has brought to it immense support and unexampled progress. From Lake Superior to Puget sound the hum of activity has prevailed. Lateral branches, such as the National Park line, the Palouse branch, Fergus & Black Hills, Little Falls & Dakota, and Fargo & Southwestern, have been constructed. Duluth has conquered the prejudices against it, and grown with amazing rapidity. Brainerd, Moorhead, Fargo and Bismarck have grown with marvelous strides. New cities have sprung into existence, such as Jamestown, Mandan, Miles City, Billings, Glendive, Livingston, Bozeman, Spokane Falls, Answorth, Portland, Seattle, and Tacoma, and other cities on the Pacific slope have doubled their population. The lumber trade, fisheries and mining interests have doubled in a single year, under the incentive of this national highway. Population along the opening lines has increased an average of one hundred and fifty per cent. The volume of emigration in numbers and character has been a marvel, and the absorption of land has been on the same extraordinary scale. The creation of empire which is progressing under the spur of the completion of the Northern Pacific is without a parallel in the history of the world. At last we stand in the presence of the completion of this colossal enterprise. It is greater than the finishing of a pyramid, or any of the seven wonders of the world which excited the admiration of antiquity. The dream of Carver, of Whitney, of Cook, is an accomplished fact. To Villard belongs the honor of completing this imperial work, and with it his name will be forever associated.

"Into the valley of the Red river of the North, and for fifty miles without a curve, passes through the great wheat farms of the valley. From the Red river valley to the Yellowstone the country is generally broad, rolling prairie, of rich farming lands, excepting where the Little Missouri cuts a deep gorge through the plateau, being bounded on either side for twelve to twenty miles by the broken formations known as the "Bad Lands," which afford shelter for stock and abundant grazing. The Yellowstone country, from the east boundary line of Montana, westward to the Belt range, consists of elevated plateaus, with various broken mountain ranges on the south, all adapted to grazing, cut by broad valleys, from a mile to six miles in width, through which the Yellowstone and its tributaries run, where the soil is a rich loam, well adapted to farming by irrigation. Central Montana is generally a mountainous country, and is cut by the main range of the Rocky mountains, with various collateral ranges, between which lie numerous fertile valleys. The mountains are covered with nutritious grasses, and are well supplied with pine timber. The soil in the valley is rich and productive and, wherever water can be obtained for irrigation, abundant crops of wheat, oats, barley, rye, potatoes, etc., are raised.

In the western part of Montana, along Clark's fork of the Columbia, and around Lake Pend d'Oreille, in northern Idaho, there is a very extensive stretch of valuable timber, consisting chiefly of pine and fir and red cedar, with considerable white pine in the vicinity of Lake Pend d'Oreille. From this lake, which has an altitude of two thousand feet, down to Wallula, the road runs over the elevated plateau known as the great plateau of the Columbia, which, west of Spokane Falls, is generally devoid of timber, though the soil is rich and adapted to general farming.

"The climate of the country through which the line passes is modified, to a greater or less extent, by the physical features of the country which it traverses. In Montana the mountains flatten out to the northward, the general elevation of the country being lower than in either Wyoming or Colorado. As the result of this flattening of the mountain ranges toward the north the warm winds from the great gulf stream of the Pacific ocean penetrate as far eastward as the Missouri valley. The winter climate of Washington Territory, Montana and western Dakota is materially modified by these west winds. The winters in Montana are less rigorous than those in Colorado or Dakota. The snowfall is greater than in Colorado, but the snows remain on the ground but a short time, and sometimes snowfall a foot in depth will disappear before the warm 'chinook' winds from the west in a single day. These facts account for the abundant grasses and remarkable advantages possessed by Montana as a cattle-raising country. The coteau that divides the waters of the Red river of the North from those of the Missouri river, serve as a barrier to diverge the cold north winds coming down from the Arctic circle across Minnesota and Wisconsin. The Missouri valley and the country westward has a winter climate, generally much milder than that of the Red river valley and of Minnesota.

"The territory of Washington possesses two distinctive climates. The country west of the Cascade range has the climate of the Pacific coast, and is covered with enormous forests of red and yellow fir and cedar, and perhaps, taken all in all, is the most extensive and valuable forest belt in the United States. The climate of the coast is remarkably equable and uniform. On Puget sound, which is never frozen over, the thermometer rarely falls below twenty degrees, and snow falls only in small quantities, and rarely lies on the ground long enough to afford sleighing. There are the wet and the dry seasons, which are characteristic of the Pacific slope. The summers are delightfully pleasant and bracing without being very warm.

"East of the Columbia river, on what is known as the great plains of the Columbia, and along the east slopes of the Blue mountains, where the general altitude of the country is one thousand five hundred to three thousand feet, the rainfall again becomes greater, and there is a stretch of country of perhaps two hundred miles in length by eighty in breadth which has no superior as a farming country anywhere in the United States.

"In the contingency of snow blockades, the Northern Pacific has decided advantages for protection over the Union and Central Pacific lines. While those lines have been compelled to erect and maintain forty miles of snow sheds, at great expense, the Northern Pacific will need no such structures. There will be no serious inconvenience arising from detentions by snow at any point west of the Missouri river. The mountain ranges are crossed at so low an altitude, comparatively, that little or no delay from snow will occur in Montana and Washington territories. In Dakota, where the difficulties from the snowfall have, in previous years, caused some delay, the improved appliances, and additional protection afforded from the planting of trees, and the erection of snow fences, has already obviated any fear of serious blockades. In the unusually severe winter of 1882 and 1883, the trains of the Northern Pacific were not delayed exceeding twenty-four hours at any time. The Northern Pacific has adopted the wise plan of planting groves of trees along the line of its road in Dakota as permanent protection against drifting snow. Fifteen thousand young trees were set out on the right of way during the past year, and arrangements have been completed for setting out young trees along the entire line through Dakota. The low altitude at which the Northern Pacific crosses the mountain ranges is another great advantage. Glendive, where the road strikes the Yellowstone, is due north of Cheyenne. The altitude of this and some other towns on the line is given below. Glendive, 2,070 feet, 4,000 feet lower than Cheyenne; at Livingston, 4,500 feet, or 600 feet lower than Denver; at a point near Bozeman, 5,565 feet, 500 feet lower than Cheyenne, and 3,000 feet lower than Sherman, the highest point on the Union Pacific, and 2,500 feet lower than the highest point reached by the Central Pacific on the Cascade range. In general it may be stated that, while there are more than 500 miles of the entire line of road between Omaha and Sacramento which exceed 4,000 feet in altitude, in the 2,000 miles between St. Paul and Portland, on the Northern Pacific road, there are not more than 250 miles which exceed 4,000 feet.

"The Northern Pacific grades compare favorably with, and are perhaps better than those of any of the other transcontinental lines. The heavy grades are concentrated at the three points where the lines cross the mountain divides, and at these places assistant power is provided. These mountain grades are as follows: Crossing of the Belt range near Montana, 20 miles, 116 feet; main range near Helena, same number of miles and same grade; crossing of the Coriaca divide, 12 miles, 116 feet.

"On all the other divisions of the road the grades are no greater than the average grades of the railroads of Wisconsin, Iowa and Missouri, and will compare favorably with the average grades of the roads east of the Mississippi. The maximum grades and curves are required by law not to exceed those of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. The maximum is only reached on the Northern Pacific in crossing the mountain ranges, the maximum exclusive of the mountain ascents being sixty-six feet. The grades on the other divisions are generally lighter than those of eastern roads, and on the Yellowstone division, for a distance of three hundred and forty miles, the maximum grade is twenty-six feet, and the maximum curve is six degrees.

"In this connection the following table, showing the altitude of the following points on the line of the road, will be of interest:

"From Duluth or Superior City, 602 feet, to Brainerd, Minnesota, 1,220 feet; Fargo, Dakota, 940 feet; Jamestown, Dakota, 1,410 feet; Bismarck, Dakota, 1,680 feet; Glendive, Montana, 2,100 feet; Miles City, Montana, 2,200 feet; Billings, Montana, 3,210 feet; Livingston, Montana, 4,450 feet; Bozeman tunnel, Montana, 5,565 feet; Bozeman, Montana, 4,838 feet; Helena, Montana, 4,266 feet; Mullan tunnel, Montana, 5,548 feet; Missoula, Montana, 3,318 feet; Spokane Falls, Idaho, 1,900 feet; Ainsworth, Washington, 340 feet; Portland, Oregon, sea level; Kalama, Oregon, sea level; Tacoma, Washington, sea level."

The total length of the main line of the Northern Pacific from Duluth to Puget sound is about two thousand miles. Its total cost will run up, for the main line alone, to over one hundred millions of dollars. It passes through the states of Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington and Oregon. The great steel bridge built by this road over the Missouri river, at Bismarck, was erected at a cost to exceed a million dollars, and is a fine piece of architectural skill. The Northern Pacific has many important connections and branches in North Dakota. Among these are the Red river and Winnipeg branch from the state line to the international boundary line, with a length of ninety-six miles; the Fergus Falls branch from the state line to Milnor, forty-two miles long; branch from Fairview to Bayne, about fourteen miles; Fargo and Southwestern Fargo to Edgeley, one hundred and eight miles; branch from Jamestown to LaMoure, forty-eight miles; Valley Junction to Oakes, fifteen miles; Sanborn to Cooperstown, thirty-seven miles; Jamestown to Leeds, one hundred and seven miles, and Carrington to Sykestown, thirteen miles. The length of the main line within the state is three hundred and seventy-seven miles, making a grand total of 870.42 miles in North Dakota.

THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILROAD.

At the time of the failure of the great banking house of Jay Cooke & Company in 1873, and the consequent bankruptcy of the Northern Pacific Railroad a part of that system formerly known as the St. Paul & Pacific, as is shown by the preceding history of the Northern Pacific was involved in difficulties with its bondholders and encumbered by a large mortgage. It was at the time in the hands of J. P. Farley, who had been appointed by the court as receiver. A syndicate, who fully recognized the magnificent possibilities of the road, was formed through the able tactics of James J. Hill, of St. Paul, which purchased the whole property. Mr. Hill, on having his attention called to it, had gone to work to investigate the financial condition of the road, and soon was master of the subject in all its details. He early enlisted the support of his friend, Norman W. Kittson, a man who was at one time, identified with North Dakota. Soon Mr. Hill induced capitalists to join in his plan of acquiring and developing the bankrupt St. Paul & Pacific, and the property was purchased and reorganized under the name of St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Company. Of the new corporation, George Stevens, of Montreal, was chosen president, and James J. Hill, general manager. August 22, 1882, Mr. Hill was elected president of the magnificent system which he has since built up so phenomenally. His elevation to the head of the company came as a just recognition of his practical primacy in the administration of the road from its inception.

Work on the transcontinental line was commenced in 1879, and in 1880 the Red river of the North was crossed and the iron horse made its appearance in Grand Forks. It stayed not but with onward steps it kept on striding across land and water, hill and dale, across the many rivers, the Rocky and other ranges of mountains onward until its forward progress was stopped by the Pacific ocean. It girdled more than half a continent with its iron bands, from the shores of Lake Superior and the banks of the Mississippi to the salt waves of the Pacific. The trackage of the road, whose name has been changed to that of the Great Northern, is the largest of any in North Dakota. In it and its fortunes the northern part of the state are most directly interested, as most of that portion is tributary to it. In the development of that part of the state the Great Northern has been one of the most important factors. From Grand Forks westward runs the main line, traversing in its course the following principal towns and county seats: Larimore, Lakota, Devil's Lake, Church's Ferry, Rugby, Towner, Minot and Williston. Among its principal branches within the state are the one from Grand Forks to Fargo; one from Wahpeton to Hope; one from Larimore to Everest; one from Larimore to Langdon; from Grand Forks to Pembina and Rosenfield, where it makes connection with the Canadian Pacific; from Grafton to Cavalier; from Tintah Junction to Ellendale; from Rutland to Aberdeen; Church's Ferry to St. John's and others. The road is finely constructed and handsomely equipped and takes equal rank with any of the great transcontinental lines. Not satisfied with the trade of one continent, the Great Northern is reaching out for the commerce of Asia. Vessels of a noble type and extraordinary tonnage are being built to be run between the termini of the railroad on the western coast and oriental ports, and soon the fabrics and productions of "Cathay and Cipango," as the world once called China and Japan, will be carried to their European consumer across the plains of North Dakota. Within the boundaries of the state there are 1,116.15 miles of track of this great railway, divided as follows: State line to Ellendale; Rutland to South Dakota line, 10.45 miles; Minnesota state line to Grand Forks, 75.35 miles; Grand Forks to the boundary line, 80.94 miles; Grafton to Walhalla, 47.84 miles; state line to Wahpeton, 6.02 miles; Minnesota state line to Larimore, via Portland, 134.45 miles; Casselton to Portland Junction, 47.03 miles; Ripon to Hope, 29.50 miles; state line to Minot, 206.79 miles; Park river junction to Hannah, 94.94 miles; Ruby Junction to Bottineau, 38.66 miles; Church's Ferry to St. John's, 55.21 miles; Addison to Rita, 11.78 miles; Minnesota state line to Alton, 9.83 miles; Minot to Montana state line, 144.15 miles, and Hope to Aneta, 28.07 miles.

MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL & SAULT SAINTE MARIE RAILROAD.

This rapidly growing road is another that is performing a very important part in the upbuilding and development of the young state. In about 1886 this line, then known as the Minneapolis & Pacific, extended their Minnesota division across the boundary line at Fairmount, Richland county, and constructed a line westward to Ransom, in Sargent county. In 1887 this was extended some fifty-nine miles farther west to Monango, Dickey county, so that by the end of that year the road had about eighty-eight miles of main track in the state. This line was shortly after extended northwesterly to Braddock, making a total mileage of this division of one hundred and eighty-eight miles. In the '90s the same company whose name had been changed to Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Sainte Marie Railroad, constructed a fine line of road from Hankinson, Richland county, to Portal, Ward county, on the international boundary line, and beyond where it connects with the Canadian Pacific road. This road cuts the state diagonally across, passing through the counties of Ward, McHenry, Wells, Foster, Stutsman, Barnes, Cass, Ransom and Richland. It thus intersects some of the finest territory in the state, and is largely interested in its growth. This company, which was formed by the consolidation of several roads in 1886, when the Minneapolis & Pacific Railway, the Aberdeen, Bismarck & Northwestern Railroad and the Minneapolis & St. Croix Railroad Companies were joined in one company, and afterward united with the Minneapolis, Sault Sainte Marie & Atlantic railroad, and assumed the name by which it is at present known. It has a total mileage of track within the state of North Dakota of 465.36 miles. One line, reaching from the Minnesota state line to Portal, has a length of 360.82 miles and the other, from Hankinson to Kulm, 104.54 miles.

CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD.

This, one of the greatest railroad systems in the United States, has as yet but little mileage with the state of North Dakota, its representative line being confined to fifteen miles of track from the south boundary line to Oakes, where it connects with the Northern Pacific and the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste Marie Railroad. In the near future new lines by this great corporation will be constructed, and do their part in developing the country.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILROAD.

This great corporation has, also, several short lines within the boundaries of North Dakota, the principal being what is known as the Fargo line, which runs from Ortonville, Minnesota, to the city of Fargo. This is a distance of one hundred and eighteen miles, of which about seventy are within the boundaries of this state. Blackmer, Fairmount, Tyler, Glenora, Wahpeton, Woodhull, Abercrombie, Enloe, Christine, Lithia, Hickson, Wild Rice, Saunders and Fargo, are the stations on this division. Two branches from the south cross the southern border of North Dakota, one running to Harlan, Sargent, county; the other through Ellendale to Edgeley, in LaMoure county.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILROAD.

The great corporation that operates over six thousand miles of railroad within the United States, has a small amount of trackage within the state. One branch from Andover to Harlan, 17.20 miles; 69.40 miles of the branch from Ortonville, Minnesota, to Fargo; 31.61 miles of the branch from Mitchell, South Dakota; in all 118.21 miles of track represent at the present the sum total of this road's holdings in the state. Other lines are projected and beyond doubt will be completed in the near future.

CHAPTER XIII.

AGRICULTURE; AGRICULTURAL AND LIVE STOCK STATISTICS; ASSESSED VALUATION OF REAL AND PERSONAL PROPERTY BY COUNTIES, ETC.

Agriculture has been from the beginning of time the true basis of the wealth of nations. The producer, the individual who causes the earth to yield its products for the needs and necessities of man, is a benefactor and a potent instrument in adding to the riches of his country. In the passage of time from the days "when Adam delved and Eve span" there have been many changes throughout the world, but through it all agriculture has always held the front rank as mighty developer of a country. The people of North Dakota, a majority of whom are engaged in the pursuits of farming life, have largely aided in demonstrating this fact. The marvelous growth of the products of its soil, millions of dollars in value have been added each year to the national wealth. In products of the field, garden and pasture, North Dakota must always take pre-eminence, with future high rank in manufacturing. The output of her products in the past years has had a marked effect upon the commerce of the world. It has turned the eyes of rich and poor in astonishment and wonder to this constant increase and development. A large proportion of the state is susceptible of cultivation. Of this a large part still is open for settlement and offers homes to the enterprising agriculturists of every clime. For the location of these, as yet, undeveloped acres the reader is referred farther on in this chapter.

The lands east of the Missouri river range in value from the government price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for a pre-emption, to five dollars to ten dollars for lands proved up, but without special improvement and considered wild lands. To begin farming in either North or South Dakota without means is not a round of pleasure; but thousands have succeeded—those blessed with character, industry and endurance. The climate is one of the healthiest on the planet; the prairies are ideal land to men whose fathers grew old in clearing away trees and stumps. The chances were never better than now for energetic men to open up farms. Land is still vacant, in sight of moving trains and close to markets. North Dakota is destined largely to be a region of small farmers. The day when men can skim over large areas is practically past. Intensive, and not extensive, farming will be the method of the future, when every acre will be subjected to use and in diversified form.

The raising of grain in North Dakota will never be abandoned, because the conditions here favor the production of the finest wheat in the world, the heaviest oats, the brightest barley and the oiliest flax; and in the near future the agriculturist will produce everything on his farm, except groceries and clothing. The industrious and persistent man who will, can become independent. His experience during first years, if he starts without means, will be no fairy existence, but in the brilliant sunshine and stimulating atmosphere much can be endured and accomplished.

The people of the great territory feel proud of their accomplishments. No equal agricultural population will show a greater, quicker and more substantial development in material and moral things—schools, churches, banks, benevolent institutions, railroads, etc.—and fewer criminals and incompetents, and they unselfishly urge the landless poor of the older states—and of foreign lands to come and share the pleasant facilities and aid in getting more.

Wheat is Dakota's principal agricultural product and will undoubtedly ever remain her chief staple, owing to the extremely favorable conditions which prevail within the territory for raising the best quality of wheat at the lowest possible cost per bushel. The report of the bureau of chemistry of the United States department of agriculture, 1884, contains the result of an analysis of 2,759 specimens of wheat, among which were included samples from every state in the Union, and many foreign countries. The chemist, says that the determination of the albuminoids, in connection with the size and condition of the wheat, settle, so far as a chemical and physical examination can succeed, the peculiarities and relative values of the samples submitted.

The result of the analysis is to establish the fact by national investigation that in the two most important desiderata, dryness and richness in albuminoids, Dakota wheat ranks the best of any grown on American soil, and probably averages the best of all the world.

The report goes on to say, "The Dakotas are all extremely rich in albuminoids, one containing as high as 18.03 per cent, which is the richest ever analyzed in the United States. These experiments by the national government prove two facts: That a bushel of Dakota wheat flour will make more bread than the same quantity of wheat raised in any other state or territory of the Union, and that the bread made from Dakota wheat flour contains more gluten and other of the materials which nourish and build up the human body, than bread made from any other kind."

The average percentage of albuminoids in the wheats of all the United States and British America is 12.15. In Dakota the average percentage is 14.95, leading every state and territory. The average percentage of dryness of the wheats of the United States and British America is 10.16. In this respect Dakota also leads every competitor with an average percentage of only 8.84 of water in the composition of wheat grown on her soil.

In speaking of the comparative cost of raising the great staple, wheat, in North Dakota and elsewhere, Hon. J. R. Dodge, the statistician of the department of agriculture at Washington, in his report for 1885, says: "While India is the principal competitor of the United States in the world's markets, her importance as a competitor is greatly overrated. The occurrence of a famine year would reduce to zero her exports. So fixed are the industrial usages of the people that great enlargement of the wheat area is next to an impossibility; there has been no material increase as a result of the exportation of the surplus of the last ten years. The extension of railroad mileage has facilitated the shipping of the surplus of good years, which would otherwise have been pitted to eke out subsistence in famine years. It might not be fair to say that these shipments have produced no effect; if any, it has been very small. The exports of ten years include nearly all the sum of India's record of exportation, and would scarcely equal the crop of an average year. A ten per cent. surplus that cannot be depended on in a crop half as large as ours, cannot take the place of our surplus, which is more than half as large as the India crop."

He is also authority for the statement that while the cost of production under favorable circumstances, and in the best localities of India, may be thirty-five to forty cents per bushel, wheat can rarely be brought to the principal markets and sold for less than sixty cents.

Consul-general Mattson, at Calcutta, says that the native of India can afford to sell his wheat at the nearest market place, if within a day's journey of his home, for fifty to sixty cents per bushel; but when it does not bring that price, or very near it, he either consumes his small supply, or stores it in a hole under the ground until a more favorable time shall come.

English wheat-growers claim that it costs about forty dollars an acre to grow wheat in England, and that they must get from forty to forty-five shillings a quarter, or from one dollar and nine cents to one dollar and thirty-six cents a bushel for their grain to make the growing of it profitable.

Dakota has the soil, the climate and every advantage in her favor as a competitor for supplying England, the great wheat market of the world, with bread, and whenever our intelligent, thinking farmers grasp the situation and till their lands as do the farmers of Europe, or even the farmers of the older settled areas of our own country, we shall at once attain, and forever maintain the prestige of wheat producers of the globe.

If the Dakota farmer can afford to raise wheat under the general haphazard style of farming, which brings him only a third of the yield, the land ought to and would produce with skillful management, with a reckless investment in farm machinery and an utter disregard of caring for it after it has been purchased, as has characterized operations in other states, and with no thought of husbanding his crops for a favorable market, but, acting in concert with all his neighbors, he throws the entire season's yield, as soon as threshed, on the hands of the grain speculator, which, as a matter of course, affects the markets disastrously—and still compete with the pauper-labor of India and the careful, painstaking farmer of Europe, what wealth and prosperity is in store for this same farmer when he shall, by means of scientific agriculture, double the yields of his fields; when he shall act judiciously in creating indebtedness and sensibly in housing his machinery; when he shall provide a storage-house for his grain and compel the grain buyer to seek him instead of putting himself entirely within the power of the elevators as now, and, last of all, when he shall diversify his crop and combine stock-raising, dairying and the other valuable adjuncts of farming with his yearly wheat ventures.

The yield of wheat in England is from twenty-six to twenty-eight bushels per acre; in France, twenty-four—about twice as much as the yield in the United States. And why? The answer is obvious—this high yield is the sole result of science, and thrift, applied to farming operations. The natural fertility of the soil does not necessarily control the yield of a country. No where on the globe is there a wheat growing soil to compete with that of the Red river valley—and yet the poor, worn out lands of some of the Eastern states are caused, through skilled effort, to bring forth heavier crops than this favored spot.

But the prospects are bright that North Dakota, with her resources but very partially developed, and but a infinitesimal part of her area sown to grain, has even now taken rank far ahead of the famous wheat-growing states of the Union, and leads all competitors in the quality of the grain produced and the cost of production. The eventualities of the near future, when the millions of acres of vacant land are peopled, and add their product to augment the territory's grand total; when farmers apply lessons of science and economy to the operations of agriculture, and when the completion of the net-work of railroads now projected give the product of the most distant farm an outlet through the lakes to the seaboard at one-fourth the present cost of transportation, cannot fill the mind with a single hope of wealth, grandeur and prosperity for Dakota which will not be realized.

Dakota's prairies will furnish the bread supply of the nation; the best article at the lowest price.

In Indian corn, or, to be more precise, maize, one of the most important crops of the United States, its average exceeding that of all other cereals, with a yield nearly double that of any other grain, North Dakota, as yet, does not take a high rank. The cultivation of corn, however, has not been attempted on a generous scale, although it produces the small hard or flint corn with success and large yield. Owing, however, to the greater success with the smaller grains, North Dakota has not shown so much advance in the raising of maize.

South Dakota has established a reputation for its excellent quality of corn and its adaptability of climate and soil for its production. The success of corn-growing in Dakota is shown in the yield of various years: In 1860 it was 20,269 bushels; in 1870 it was 133,140 bushels; in 1880 it was 200,864 bushels; in 1885 it was 7,800,593 bushels; in 1888 it was 19,068,680 bushels; in 1889 it was 22,832,073 bushels, of which quantity a little over 1,000,000 was grown in North Dakota, the total exceeding that of twenty other states. The crop matures without damage from frost or ravages from insects, and farmers declare that the yield, condition, average and profit is better than in any other part of the country in which they have had experience. Of the quality of corn raised in Dakota, the same is true as has been said of the quality of our wheat. It is extremely rich in albuminoids and nitrogen (the nourishing properties), and in this respect is above the average corn grown in the east and the general average of the composition of American corn.

The production of flax in North Dakota is barely in its infancy as compared with the interest that will be devoted to this crop in the future, when capital shall have built up in the territory manufacturing to utilize the seed and the fiber. At present, owing to a lack of such industries, it is grown principally for the seed, and the fiber or straw is burned or wasted, and the fiber, too, being equal to that grown in Ireland, from which the best linens are made. Flax and sod corn are usually the first crops raised on new land. They can be sown on freshly turned sod with a reasonable assurance of a good yield under any circumstances. Flax is one of the best subduers that can be grown on the sod, and places the ground in excellent condition for working the next season, for any kind of a crop. Planted in this way it yields, ordinarily, from seven to fifteen bushels per acre, and in many instances a single crop has paid for the land, in addition to the cost of breaking and planting. As a profitable "sod crop" it is a real godsend to the new settler. If he can turn over forty acres of sod prior to, say, the 20th of June, or even later, he can confidently rely on ten bushels an acre, of the value of say $400, and can make the seed in one hundred days from the time when he unlimbers his plow on the prairie. The flax crop in the territory in 1879 amounted to 26,757 bushels; in 1885 to 2,916,983 bushels, and in 1889 to 3,288,115 bushels. Facts and figures as to the amount of flax grown in North Dakota in these recent years are either misleading or entirely lacking, and the government census of 1900 will be the only safe guide. Suffice to say that the state does its fair share in the raising of this money-producing cereal.

The amount of seed produced elsewhere in the United States than as stated above is so small as not to be taken into account by statisticians. It is shown that North Dakota produces over one-quarter of the entire product, and that Dakota and Minnesota together more than one-half of all the seed raised in the country. Projects looking to the building up of flax mills, paper and cordage manufactories—efforts which are certain to succeed sooner or later because of the profit which must ensue to the farmer in raising the crop could he find a market at home for the seed and straw. For the immense quantities of linseed oil, paints, oil-cake, straw-paper, cloth, twine (especially that which is used for binding the wheat crop), and other articles manufactured from flax, annually consumed in North Dakota, its people now pay a tribute to other regions which is justly due the people of their state. The introduction of flax mills will add a new source of wealth to North Dakota, and furnish a wonderful impetus to the growing, by our farmers, of one of the most profitable crops.

Oats, next after wheat in the total yield and value, is the prominent crop. Its use as human food is extending the North Dakota article, as well as all of that produced in the northwest, being of unusual excellence for making meal. It is a hardy plant, and upon the whole considered a very safe and reliable crop, being subject to fewer diseases and insect pests, and is less exhausting to the soil than any other of the cereals. It has been known to yield as high as 119 bushels to the acre in Dakota, the average, however, being from 40 to 80 bushels, and weighing, generally, 42 pounds to the bushel. In 1860 the crop was 2,540 bushels; in 1870 it was 114,327; in 1880 it was 2,217,132; in 1885 it was 22,970,698; in 1888 it was 30,408,585 bushels, and only thirteen acres of each 1,000 in the territory in cultivation with the crop. The crop of the year 1898 was 11,311,556 bushels for North Dakota alone.

Barley does remarkably well in North Dakota, the product being of unusual brightness and highly prized by brewers, who take the entire yield for the production of malt to be used in brewing. In European countries it, with rye, constitute the chief breadstuffs used by the peasantry, the two cereals making the black bread they eat, wheat or white bread being almost unknown to them. The yield in the territory of Dakota is given as 4,118 bushels in 1870; 277,424 bushels in 1880; 2,170,059 bushels in 1885, and 6,400,568 in 1887. The production of North Dakota, alone, in 1898, was 5,123,919 bushels.

Next after the cereals the potato constitutes the principal vegetable food of the American people. The quality and quantity of yield of these vegetables cannot be excelled anywhere in the United States. They grow to immense size, some even attaining a weight of six pounds; are uniformly sound, very mealy, and are conceded to equal those grown in Colorado, or any of the older states of union. They yield from 150 to 500 bushels to the acre, and are such good keepers, owing to their soundness, lasting until late in the summer, that their future commercial value is immense. The crop for the two Dakotas was, for 1860, 9,489 bushels. In 1870 this had arisen to 50,177 bushels; in 1880 to 664,086, and in 1885 to 3,868,860. The product of North Dakota for the year 1898 was 1,770,390 bushels.

Onions are a prolific crop, growing to an enormous size, and yield from 400 to 800 bushels per acre.

Turnips and all other vegetables, also, do exceedingly well, making large returns to the farmer who engages in their cultivation.

The native, nutritious grasses indigenous to the country are relied on mostly for forage for stock and to make into hay, not many farmers making much of an effort to cultivate the domestic grasses. Some timothy, some clover and some alfalfa are raised, but not in any large quantity.

Careful investigation shows that the soil of Dakota is a drift or alluvial loam from one to four feet deep, underlaid with a clay subsoil having the properties of holding moisture to a wonderful degree, which is given out as needed by the growing crops; that it contains an inexhaustible supply of the most important soil constituents, as soluble silica, lime, potash, soda, phosphoric acid, nitrogen and vegetable humus, and will produce for a lifetime abundant crops under favorable climatic conditions, and the soil varies but little in different localities. It would seem that it contains the proper percentage of plant constituents to give it the peculiar chemical composition requisite for producing cereals richest in albuminoids and in life-sustaining properties. By government analysis it has also been determined that Dakota wheat and corn take the first rank as regards the percentage of albuminoids and nitrogen of any grown in the United States. In appearance the soil is dark to grayish-brown in color, being darkest in the lower plains and valleys, where it occasionally approaches to blackness. It is everywhere exceedingly friable and easily worked.

The chemist of the national agricultural department, in summing up the results of analysis of samples of soil from all parts of the United States, including three from widely separated sections of Dakota, reaches the following conclusions:

First—The remarkable adaptability of Dakota soils to readily imbibe and retain moisture. Of all the samples analyzed by the chemist only one exceeded in the percentage of hygroscopic moisture the lowest amount obtained from either of the Dakota soils.

Second—That as regards silica in its soluble state (and in this way only is it valuable as a source of plant food), the Dakota soil ranks third in the list of the thirty samples analyzed, and is, therefore, particularly well adapted to the raising of cereal crops, which possess in a marked degree the capacity for feeding on silicates. And the same is true of the percentage shown of hydrated silica, which represents that which is gradually available for plant food.

Third—It contains the average of four per cent. of ferric oxide, valuable because to its presence is chiefly due the retention of phosphoric acid, and because it tends to make clay lands easier of tillage.

Fourth—In the percentage of alumina or clay in the soil, the samples from Dakota, containing an average of over eight per cent., are again third on the list. Its presence is valuable as furnishing a supply of potash, and because it has the important property of absorbing and retaining phosphoric acid, ammonia, potash, lime and other substances necessary for plant food. The chemist declares the light clay soil, containing from six to ten per cent. of alumina, the best for wheat.

Fifth—It shows an abundant supply of phosphoric acid, which, the chemist says, "in general, even in the most fertile soils, is found in very minute quantities." The percentage of phosphoric acid found in one Dakota sample is exceeded in but one of all the samples analyzed.

Sixth—The chemist lays down the rule that the percentage of lime in clay loams should not fall below .250, and in the heavy clay soils not below .500. The analysis of the samples from Dakota shows nearly double the last amount in all three instances, and in the case of one it ranks first on the entire list as regards the percentage of lime.

Seventh—The percentage of potash varies only slightly in the Dakota samples, and is ample for all time to come. The chemist remarks that a soil containing .125 per cent. should furnish potash for a century, and that high per cent. of potash makes up for low percentage of lime. The Dakota samples show a percentage of potash of .720, .725 and .745 respectively.

Eighth—The analysis show that the amount of nitrogen in the Dakota soil is very large, and agrees closely in the three samples, and that it is rich enough in this necessary soil constituent for the continued raising of abundant crops. Two of the samples of prairie soil ranks, in this respect, third on the list analyzed.

Ninth—The prairie soils contains a percentage of humus, or organic matter, greater than twenty-five out of the thirty samples analyzed. The smallest percentage of humus obtained from an analysis of the three samples was 6.171, and the greatest 10.175, while the famous black soil of the Ural mountains in Russia contains but 5 to 12 per cent. In the most fertile soils of this country vegetable humus occurs only in small quantities. It is hygroscopic; that is, it greatly increases the water-holding power of soils and enables them to withstand prolonged drought, besides furnishing valuable food for the growing plants.

IRRIGATION.

It is well known that much of the country west of the one hundredth meridian requires irrigation to insure regular success in agriculture. Over this vast region, which includes half of the area of the republic, the air is so dry that there is little or no dew, and a rainfall too slight or too unseasonable to allow general cultivation of the soil. The annual rainfall over this great region ranges from twenty inches in western Dakota down to four in Arizona and southern California. The eastern limit of the arid belt approaches the Missouri river in western Dakota, and is classed by Major Powell as semi-humid, which in one season may be well watered, while in the next year everything not artificially watered will perish for the want of moisture. In the cycles of dry years, which alternate with wet years in recurring periods of from ten to twelve years, as maintained by scientific men, the whole of Dakota is liable to suffer from the lack of moisture, the area of danger extending eastward beyond the Great Lakes. This year has been remarkable for drought across the continent from the lake region to the Pacific coast.

In view of the success of irrigation in various parts of Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico and California, public attention has been gradually attracted to the possibilities of extending water service to a large share of the arid belt. Congress has finally taken hold of the matter, and the work has become a national one. This season a senate committee visited Dakota and all parts of the north, west and southwest, traveling fourteen thousand miles, examining witnesses, and looking over sites for proposed reservoirs and canals to be constructed.

Congressional aid was asked in aid of irrigation early in President Grant's administration, twenty years ago, and he recommended a comprehensive preliminary survey, but there was still plenty of land untaken in the humid belt, and so the matter rested until September, 1888, when an appropriation of $100,000 was given to pay for surveying and locating "storage reservoirs at the heads of streams for the purpose of irrigation." The matter was put into the hands of Major Powell, superintendent of the geological survey, and he has since devoted his time to the consideration of that work. He, perhaps, knowing more about the subject than any other man in the country, says it is possible to reclaim no less than 100,000,000 acres, and year after year, one acre of perfectly watered land being worth three of land in a region of uncertain rainfall. To convert this enormous area, equal to more than two-thirds of the states east of the Mississippi, into a habitable and productive land, means an accretion of wealth to the republic of which all history contains no parallel.

To say that Major Powell's project is new or unprecedented is not the case. Systems of irrigation, perhaps not on such an extensive scale, were undertaken and carried to success in the long-gone ages. J. H. Beadle, in a recent article on this subject, says: "The oldest written records refer to it as a thing of course, and among the oldest drawings are those representing the Egyptian raising water from his fields. It is scarcely possible to imagine any system which has not been practiced in in one or more countries, from the use of the rudest vessel to simply dip up the water, up through all the grades of common hand labor to the Egyptian 'Shadouf,' or from the simple bamboo wheel of the East Indian to the elaborate system of dams, reservoirs, flumes and canals which made Babylonia the very garden of the Lord for abundance, and which have lately been paralleled by the British in India and the Americans in Utah and Colorado. Equally difficult would it be to find any new features as to water supply and its value, for in the United States alone is found every grade, from the rocky little troughs of the Moquis Indians of Arizona, by whom the tiniest rill is husbanded as if water were golden, to the mammoth flume of Boulder county, Colorado, where a river is anchored to a mountain side and made to feed hundreds of artificial lakes, fish ponds and fountains."

Of the age which built the pyramids it is easy to believe that irrigation works of equally colossal scale were created. A region of Asia Minor, now a desert waste, an area of which our own great Dakota would only make a part, was once fruitful with gardens and orchards and dense with people. Irrigation is mentioned in the earliest Chinese history. In Egypt, Syria and all of eastern Asia agriculture has always depended upon irrigation, and so still depends in countries where the people have survived the governmental changes all along the path of time. The irrigation of the fields, gardens and vineyards is often spoken of in the Bible. The earliest systems of California and other parts of the west are copied from ancient models. The actual history of irrigation in our country begins with the Pacific Railroad, and it has already assumed such proportions that all the interested states and territories have enacted laws governing the construction of the works and the use of water. The remains of irrigation works in India and Ceylon show that water was carried for hundreds of miles in wide canals along mountain sides and across valleys, in such quantities that, despite the great loss by evaporation under a burning sun, there was enough left to fertilize many millions of acres.

Major Powell says the work we are going to do in the American west men did successfully many thousand years ago, and we have the advantage over the ancient builders in having superior, even superhuman, machinery, and possessing far higher engineering skill. They had to work without a steam or hydraulic power, and without the compass, or barometer, accomplishing their prodigious tasks by the simple multiplication of mere muscle. The loss of life involved in the construction of irrigation works in Mesopotamia, Babylonia and Persia must have been enormous, but the will of the Asiatic despots hesitated at no obstacle; if the labor supply ran short, a war was undertaken and a host of captives took the places of the dead and helpless. No such gloomy incidents will mark the construction of the western American system. To store the waters in the mountains, to excavate the canals for their transport to the plains, to dig ditches for their distribution, to sink artesian wells and pump waters from the rivers to the reservoirs, will take much labor, time and money, but happily the work will not be dangerous; there is plenty of labor, we can take the time, and there will be no lack of money. It is the claim of some enthusiasts that much of the water of the Missouri and tributaries will be absorbed by the dry lands through irrigation, and by thus reducing the volume of the lower Mississippi river allow the reclamation of the lands now unavailable along the course of that mighty stream, and thus prevent disastrous floods, now so common along the lower part of that river.

From government reports we learn that the different stages of progress in water utilization are six in number, to-wit:

First—The use of the rainfall in what are properly known as rain belts, by the most effective methods of cultivation, and the selection of suitable plants, especially those with long tap roots.

Second—The exhaustion of the supply furnished by rivers and creeks in their passage through the plains, by means of irrigation works, such as are already in extensive use. There are few streams which cannot be used to the full amount of their annual discharge.

Third—The enlargement of the existing supply by the storage of higher elevations of water which pass away in spring floods, a work now entered upon by congress. The building of numerous catch-basins throughout the plains to save the rainfall which is wasted, so far as the lands nearby are concerned, will add greatly to the supply furnished by running streams. There are natural depressions everywhere which can be utilized at very slight cost, and with entire immunity from risks of dangerous floods.

Fourth—The sinking of galleries or tunnels below the surface of streams, even when they are practically dry, and utilizing by canals the underground currents. This is becoming a popular resource. Such a plan furnishes pure filtered water at Cheyenne, Wyoming, for the supply of the city, without pumping or much expense, from a small stream nearly dry in summer. The utilization of surface water does not exhaust the supply for irrigation. The application involves waste. The fugitives waters sinking into the ground pass into the depressions which make the waterways, and gradually swell the scanty streams at lower levels, or course their way toward the sea through the sands below the river beds. Thus a part of the water of irrigation canals is gathered a second time to do the work of irrigation. This is the case notably in the South Platte, in Colorado, after its waters have been depleted by the canals above Denver and the Cache la Poudre supply has been similarly used between Fort Collins and Greeley. At the latter place the cellars require protection from overflow, water in wells has risen nearly to the surface, and the waters of irrigation are partially restored to the stream to find their way to the South Platte.

Fifth—By the use of stationary pumps of sufficient power, in lifting such underground currents to the surface from bed rock, for application to surrounding lands.

Sixth—By artesian wells, which have hitherto proved too expensive for use in irrigation. It is probable that their cost and the uncertainty of obtaining water will prevent extensive employment of this means of water supply, except in parts of Dakota, Kansas and California. The artesian basin of central Dakota is the largest known to the world, and is the only large locality, probably, where water obtained in this way can come into general use.

The quantity of water necessary to irrigate an acre depends upon the slope of the land, porosity of the soil, the dryness of the atmosphere, and the nature of the crops cultivated. Throughout the west the common method of measuring water is by what is known as the "miner's inch," viz., the quantity which will flow throughout an opening one inch square, under a given pressure. Forty miner's inches is considered equal to the flowage of one cubic foot per second, and all authorities agree that this amount flowing constantly through the season will be sufficient for about two hundred acres under the most exacting conditions. By economy, not generally practiced, however, by Americans, it can be made to do duty on from three hundred to one thousand acres per second foot, but under the lavish custom of Colorado a miner's inch is given to an acre, or a second foot to each forty acres. The price of water to consumers varies in different localities, the companies owning the canals charging by the miner's inch, the second foot, or by an acre irrigated. In Colorado the cost ranges from $1.50 to $5.00 per inch, with higher rates in California. The water is applied to the land by flooding in thin or deep sheets, and allowing it to stand or run off through small ditches; the former method for grain sown broadcast, and the latter for crops planted in rows. The ditches vary in number according to circumstances, but when small and numerous, with the water running continually, very uneven and rolling surfaces can be well served. It has been found that land thoroughly watered for a term of years requires much less, and in some cases none at all. This is doubtless due to the subsoil becoming thoroughly soaked and then yielding its moisture by capillary attraction to the roots of growing plants.

Land as productive as that of Dakota should not be allowed to remain idle. A great part of it can be irrigated, and irrigation means a large increase in the yield or crops. The wheat of Dakota is needed to feed the hungry of every land. The certainty of yearly crops commends the plan, not to speak of the increased yield. Let us move in the matter of lining the country with reservoirs and water ditches, and wait no longer for the coming of wet periods. Every farmer living near a stream, by means of a windmill, can get up a little system of irrigation of his own. The Jamestown hospital for the insane irrigated and fertilized twenty acres of garden a few years ago with waste water and sewage, and produced several thousand dollars worth of products. The rainfall of Dakota is sufficient, but it does not always come at seasonable times, and much of it is of no use. A lack of rain for two or three weeks at seedtime, or during the growing season, is very injurious and sometimes fatal to crops. In general terms it may be said that could the Dakota farmer water his fields when the soil needs moisture, thirty bushels of wheat would be a small rather than a large yield. A vital question, then, to the Dakota farmer is the subject of irrigation. If his fields could produce twice as much grain—to say nothing about three or four times as much, as claimed by those who have studied the subject—it would certainly be a great gain if he could manage to secure irrigation. If the valleys of Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Oregon, Washington and Montana are to be converted into irrigated grain fields, the vast products of these regions will compel the Dakota farmer likewise to secure irrigation, or quit farming. How can he get ahead with his fields averaging say fifteen bushels of wheat, when the far western farmer, who can moisten his fields at will, is getting thirty, forty and fifty. The relief to Dakota is irrigation in the off years. Can it be accomplished? Certainly. Had the farmers of Dakota been able to water their fields this year their crops would have been enormous instead of being merely fair. By tapping the artesian basins and utilizing the flow of rivers, by storing the rainfall and saving the melted snow, the fields of Dakota could be made to rival those of the Nile in productiveness. This artificial supply of water would not only produce wonderful crops of grain, but vegetables, grasses, forage, plants and small fruits; while trees would spring forth in plenty and glory, covering the face of the country with orchards and groves, and giving character and beauty to the landscape, not possible now without great labor; and then there would be no want of anything that is in the earth.

The proposition to begin a general system of irrigation in Dakota has some opposition, in the belief that settlements may be retarded when the idea goes abroad that artificial agencies are needed to properly moisten the soil for agriculture. That is certainly not the right view to take of it. To succeed, man must help himself to everything that nature provides. When the clouds fail us we must make different arrangements, and supply the needed moisture from other sources. The Missouri river alone carries a volume of water sufficient, and to spare, to nourish the crops of an empire—water which now wends its way to the sea through a fruitful region, but sometimes perishing of thirst. Nature has furnished us with underground rivers which only need tapping to give of their abundance. Had there been a plentiful supply of moisture to the fields of Dakota this year, the great territory would have had $50,000,000 worth more of crops.

The plan of securing flowing artesian wells, and pumping water from the rivers into the empty lake beds of Dakota, is practical. Rainfall and melted snow can also be diverted from the streams and stored in the lakes, of which there are hundreds—natural reservoirs in which the waters can remain until of right temperature for irrigation. Major Powell suggests what he calls the "tank system" for Dakota. By this he means a pond on every farm, where it is possible for the storage of rain and snow water until needed. He says that a twenty-acre tank filled with water to a depth of ten feet will irrigate three hundred acres of land, and increase the value of the land several hundred per cent. and give a wonderful increase in yield. In his opinion Dakota has a remarkable soil, and very little irrigation will be needed. It would not be necessary to flood the land, but only run the water over it in ditches.

From a statistical map of North Dakota, issued in 1899, by the department of agriculture and labor, Hon. H. U. Thomas, commissioner, the following facts are gleaned:

The state of North Dakota has an area of 72,312 square miles. It has an estimated population of 300,000, has 2,797 miles of railroad, 590 postoffices, over 150 newspapers, 2,333 schools, with 3,637 teachers. OV. FREDERICK B. FANCHER. In studying the lives and characters of prominent men we are naturally led to inquire into the secret of their success, and the motives that have prompted their action.

Success is oftener a matter of experience and sound judgment and thorough preparation for a life work than it is of genius, however bright. When we trace the career of those whom the world acknowledges as successful and of those who stand highest in public esteem, we find in almost every case they are those who have risen gradually by their own efforts, their diligence and perseverance. These qualities are undoubtedly possessed in a large measure by the gentleman whose name introduces this sketch, and added to these is a devotion to principle that may well be termed the keynote of his character.

Governor Fancher was born in Orleans county, New York, April 2, 1852, a son of E. Tillotson and Julia A. (Kenyon) Fancher, also natives of that state, as was the grandfather, Richard Fancher, who spent his entire life there engaged in agricultural pursuits. The father followed farming and stock raising in New York until 1867, when he removed to Washtenaw county, Michigan, and made his home there until going to Washington, D. C., in 1880, where he now resides. In his family were only two children.

Governor Fancher was reared on the home farm and was educated in the common schools and in the State Normal of Michigan. In 1871 he went to Chicago, where he was engaged in fire underwriting until coming to North Dakota in 1881. He took up a claim in Stutsman county, proved up the same and engaged in farming for some time, making a specialty of wheat. He also managed farms for other parties. In 1889 he organized the Alliance Hail Association, of which he was president for six years, and was also president of the board of trustees of the North Dakota Hospital for the Insane for the same length of time.

In 1874 Governor Fancher married Miss Florence S. Van Voorhies, a native of New Jersey, and a daughter of John J. Van Voorhies. Socially our subject is a prominent Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine. Politically he has always affiliated with the Republican party, and has taken a very active and prominent part in public affairs, doing all in his power to insure the success of his party and advance its interest. In 1889 he was elected to the constitutional convention of North Dakota, and made president of the same. In 1892 he was nominated for insurance commissioner and was defeated, but in 1894 he was re-nominated and elected and re-elected in 1896. Two years later he was the nominee of his party for governor and elected to that office, which he is now so creditably filling. Never were the reins of government in more capable hands, for he is a progressive man, pre-eminently public-spirited, and all that pertains to the public welfare receives his hearty endorsement.

CAPTAIN ALEXANDER GRIGGS, the "Father of Grand Forks," is one of the most widely known and highly esteemed men who cast their lot with North Dakota. He is now a resident of the state of Washington, but until recent years was engaged in navigation throughout the Red river district, and was identified with the financial growth of the city of Grand Forks and vicinity.

Our subject was born at Marietta, Ohio, in October, 1838, and was a son of William and Esther (McGibbon) Griggs. He removed with his parents to St. Paul, Minnesota, when a boy, and later his family removed to Grand Forks, where his parents died. Our subject was reared and educated in St. Paul, and at an early age began running on the boats of the Mississippi river, and at the age of twenty years was given command of a boat. He continued there until 1870, and then, in company with others, went up the Red river to Fargo with a view of establishing a line of boats, and during that year the Hill, Griggs & Company Navigation Company was formed. In 1871 Mr. Griggs went to where Grand Forks is now located, and he entered a claim to the land on which the old town is located, and named the place Grand Forks on account of the junction of the two rivers. He continued to operate a line of boats between Grand Forks and Winnipeg for many years and continued in command until 1890. He was always active in the upbuilding of the town of Grand Forks, and was one of the founders of the Second National Bank, of which institution he was president for many years. He also acted in the capacity of president of the First National Bank of East Grand Forks for some years, and established the gas works in company with William Budge, and was also a large owner in the Grand Forks Roller Mill. He served as railroad commissioner for some years, and was the third postmaster of Grand Forks and was mayor of the city. He assisted in building the two bridges across the river, and by his hearty support and influence endeared himself to the people as a man of active public spirit. In December, 1892, Mr. Griggs left Grand Forks on account of failing health, and is now engaged in boating on the Upper Columbia river.

Our subject was married December 27, 1865, in Minnesota, to Miss Ettie I. Strong, a native of Brooklyn. Eight children, seven of whom are now living, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Griggs, named as follows: Lois, now Mrs. W. H. Pringle; Ansel; Jennie; Esther; Bruce; James and Clifford. The family all reside in the state of Washington at present. Mr. Griggs is an ardent Democrat and is a man who keeps pace with the times.

HENRY R. PORTER, M. D., one of the most distinguished and honored citizens of Bismarck, North Dakota, and of whom a steel engraving is presented on another page, is the only surviving surgeon of the three who were with Custer's regiment on the fateful June day, in 1876, when so many gallant men perished in the never-to-be-forgotten battle on the Little Big Horn. He was born in Lee Center, Oneida county, New York, February 13, 1848, and is a son of Henry N. and Helen (Polson) Porter, the former also a native of Oneida county, New York, the latter of Scotland. The father graduated from the Geneva Medical College of New York, and for many years was engaged in practice in that state, but is now living retired in Washington, D. C. The grandfather, Norton Porter, was also a physician and surgeon, and died in New York after many years of practice. Our subject has two sisters who are also living in Washington, D. C.

Dr. Porter, of this review, completed his literary education at the seminary in Whitestown, New York, in 1868, and then commenced the study of medicine with his father. In 1869 he entered the University of Michigan, where he spent one year, and the following year he passed in England and Scotland. On his return to this country he entered the Georgetown University, D. C., and was graduated from the medical department of that institution in 1872.

The same year Dr. Porter was appointed an acting assistant surgeon in the United States army and was assigned to General Crook's command, then in Arizona, where he remained for a year and a half, during which time he was in seven or eight battles with the Apaches. In general orders No. 14, issued by General Crook, and dated, Prescott, Arizona, April 9, 1873, the Doctor is mentioned for gallantry in the engagement in Superstition mountains, January 16, 1873, and again for conspicuous service and gallantry in different engagements against the Tonto Apaches in February and March, 1873.

Later during the year Dr. Porter was transferred to Bismarck, North Dakota, as post surgeon at Camp Hancock with General Custer, remaining with the command until after the death of that famous general. The most remarkable fight in the history of Indian warfare was the battle fought on the Little Big Horn river in Montana, between the command of General Custer and the allied forces of all the renegade Indians in the west under the leadership of Chiefs Gall and Sitting Bull, June 25, 1876. It was remarkable from the fact that not a single man in Custer's command escaped to tell the tale. Of this battle Dr. Porter gives the following account:

"Our expedition left Fort Abraham Lincoln on May 17, 1876, under the command of General Terry, and proceeded overland. Mrs. Custer accompanied her husband on horseback as far as Heart river, a distance of several miles, and there bid him an affectionate farewell, and returned to the garrison. We marched in easy stages to Powder river in Montana. Nothing of particular note occurred on the march except that one day we saw, with field glasses, a lone horseman at a distance of several miles. He had evidently seen us and was riding toward our command. We thought of course that he was an Indian, as it did not seem possible that any white man could be off in that wilderness, hundreds of miles from any habitation, alone. As he came nearer we discovered that it was none other than Buffalo Bill, the noted scout and Indian fighter. He was one of General Crook's scouts and was off on an expedition of his own. General Crook's command was then in the region of the Black Hills, miles away. After we had gone into camp at Powder river, Reno was ordered out on a scouting expedition. He found a wide Indian trail leading in a westerly direction toward Rosebud river. Custer was then ordered to follow the trail. The Indians had been located by General Terry's scouts, and he told Custer to strike them on the 26th. Terry was sure that his scouts had them well located, and results demonstrated that he was correct. Generals Terry and Gibbon were to go by another route and were to strike the Indians in front and Custer was to close in on the rear. Custer started from the camp on Powder river on the morning of June 24. I was sent with him. We were on the trail all that day and night. The night was very dark and we lost the trail once, but found it again by lighting matches.

"We proceeded until four o'clock, the morning of the 25th, when we camped in a deep ravine where the Indians could not see us. We were not allowed to unsaddle or unpack. Being very tired after our long ride, we laid down and slept, each man holding his horse by the bridle reins. In about an hour the scouts reported a large camp of Indians ahead. The command was ordered to get ready for action. Custer came to me and said: 'Porter, there is a large camp of Indians ahead, and we are going to have a great killing.' At six o'clock we started. It was Custer's purpose at this time to charge the Indians in a body, he supposing that our presence had not been discovered by them. In a short time the scouts reported that we had been seen by the Indians. Custer then decided to divide the command. He sent Colonel Benteen with three companies to the left; Major Reno with three companies in the center; and he took three companies and was to go to the right, his idea being to surround the Indian camp. Captain McDougal was left in charge of the pack train. It was about ten o'clock when the command was divided. Just as we were ready to start, Custer came to me and said: 'Doctor, I would like to have you go with me, as you are younger and more robust and Dr. Lord, the chief surgeon, is not feeling very well.' I replied, 'All right. I would much prefer going with you.' Custer then said: 'I will see Dr. Lord and ask him to consent.' We rode over to where Dr. Lord was, and Custer spoke to him about the contemplated arrangement. The Doctor replied: 'Not much. I am going with you.' The poor fellow in those few words saved my life and sealed his own doom. I went with Reno. We had proceeded but a short distance when Captain Cook, Custer's adjutant, came up and said: 'The Indians are right ahead of you, and you are ordered to charge them as fast as possible.'

"We went forward at a lively gait. When we came to the river we discovered the Indians were on the opposite bank. We forded the river and suddenly came upon ten or fifteen redskins, and they were running. We then thought that we had already won the fight. We rode some little distance toward the Indian camp, when suddenly a swarm of red devils rose up and poured a terrific fire into us. We dismounted and formed a skirmish line. At first there were only a few, comparatively, then more and more of the savages appeared, and the ground seemed to be fairly alive with them. They were all naked and their bodies were painted hideously. They all rode their ponies bareback. The fire finally became so hot that Reno ordered his men to mount, and led them under cover of the woods. Then the Indians closed in on us, shooting through the branches, killing some of our men. A soldier was shot in the little clump of trees where I was. I dismounted and found him mortally wounded. Reno ordered the troops to mount and charge, and a running fight ensued. My horse was rearing and plunging, and I had all I could do to hold him. The Indians, in their mad pursuit of our troops, did not notice me in the timber. They were passing within ten feet of where I was. I placed laudanum on the wound of the soldier and bandaged it as best I could, and again mounted my frightened horse. As I was leaving the poor soldier said: 'For God's sake, Doctor, don't leave me to be tortured by those fiends.' Bullets were flying thick and fast, and I turned my horse loose and caught up with our troops, who had gotten half a mile away. In that half mile ride I think I was the target of a thousand rifles, but I escaped without a scratch. We again forded the river and took a stand on the top of a steep hill. A few minutes later Benteen, with his three companies came up, as did McDougal, with the pack train. Benteen, after leaving us when the command was divided, had gone west to the river. Not seeing any Indians and hearing the firing he rushed back and joined us. We fought there the remainder of the day, surrounded by three thousand savages, while there were only three hundred of us, all told. The men dug rifle pits with their knives and tin cups. At dark the Indians stopped firing. Some of the men then crawled down to the river and secured water. We had been fighting in the broiling sun all day without a drop of water, and the wounded were begging for a drink. I had some brandy with me, but I told them that it would make them worse. They insisted on having it, anyway. Next morning the Indians again opened fire on us. Although Reno was ranking officer, Colonel Benteen was really in command, and to his coolness and bravery those of us who were saved owe our lives. With the air thick with bullets and some of them piercing his clothing, he stood calmly directing the troops. Occasionally a band of savages would dash up to within two or three hundred yards of us, and our men would then charge them. Several Indians were killed in these charges, and finally one of the soldiers killed and scalped an Indian in plain view of the others. This frightened them and they kept a safe distance away after that. A perfect storm of leaden hail was poured in on us all day the 26th until about four o'clock in the afternoon, when the firing gradually ceased. We were then frightened, as we thought the Indians were up to some bloodier mischief. Finally we saw them moving off in a body. That night most of the soldiers slept, and were much refreshed in the morning. After the Indians left we were able to procure water. We had all been nearly famished. During the morning of the 27th General Terry and his command came up. He and his staff were all crying, and General Terry said: 'Custer and his whole command are killed. We thought you were, too.'

"During the two days we were surrounded by the Indians the inquiry among our men for Custer was loud, and that General's court-martial was freely speculated upon. After separating from us Custer had gone through a rough country for a distance of four or five miles and attacked the Indians in the rear. As soon as we could, several of the officers and myself went over to where Custer had fought, and found what General Terry had reported to be only too true. We found Custer's body stark naked, as white and clean as a baby's. He was shot in the head and breast. The body of Captain Tom Custer, General Custer's brother, was horribly mutilated. He was disemboweled, and his head had been crushed in by a blow from a stone hammer used by the Indians. The only arrow wound I found was in his head. He had the Sioux mark of death, which was a cut from the hip to the knee, reaching to the bone. His heart was not cut out, as has been reported by Rain-in-the-face, one of the Sioux chiefs who took part in the fight. I cut a lock of hair from the head of each officer as he lay, and gave it to their families on my return home. The steamer Far West was moored at the mouth of the Little Big Horn. She was the supply boat of the expedition, and had made her way up the Big Horn farther than any other boat. After burying the dead we took the wounded on litters ten or twelve miles to the boat, and I was detailed to go down to Fort Lincoln with them. Colonel Smith, Terry's adjutant general, was sent along with the official dispatches, and he had a traveling bag full of telegrams for the Bismarck office. Captain Grant Marsch, of Bismarck, was in command of the "Far West," and the steamer performed a feat unequalled in western steambating. Marsch put everything in the most complete order and took a large supply of fuel. His orders were to reach Bismarck as soon as possible. The steamer never received the credit due her, nor did her gallant captain. The Big Horn is full of islands, and a successful passage is not an easy feat, but the boat made it without an accident, after a thrilling voyage. At Fort Buford and Fort Stevenson we stopped a minute to tell the news, and at Fort Berthold a wounded scout was put off. Two of the wounded died, and we went ashore to bury them. We approached home with something of that feeling that always moves the human heart. It was one mixed with sorrow and gladness. At eleven o'clock on the night of the 5th of July we reached Bismarck and Fort Lincoln, having made one thousand miles in fifty-four hours. Colonel Smith and myself hurried from the land up town, and called up Colonel Lounsbury, the editor of the "Tribune," and the telegraph operator, J. M. Carnahan, who took his seat at the key and scarcely raised himself from his chair for twenty-two hours. What he sent vibrating around the world is history."

One of the officers in Reno's command has the following to say of Dr. Porter's services during the memorable fight on Reno's Hill: "The afternoon of the 25th, all night, throughout the 26th, the night of that date, and until the forenoon of the 27th, Dr. Porter worked as few men are ever called upon to work. He had no idea that he would get out alive, and believed every man around him was doomed. Still he was the same cool and skillful surgeon that he is today. He had a duty to perform that seldom falls to a man of twenty-six, and yet he performed it nobly. He was surrounded by the dead, dying and wounded. Men were crying for water, for help, for relief, for life. For twenty-four hours there was no water. The sun was blazing hot. The dead horses were sickening, the air heavy with a hundred smells, the bullets thick, the men falling, and bluffs for miles around black with the jubilant savages. The work of the others was not like Porter's. He must know no fear, no trembling, no rest. He had every agonizing sight before his eyes. The afternoon of the 26th, when the Indians ceased their firing and began to move off, there were around Porter on the ground fifty dead and fifty wounded. One in every three was either killed or maimed. I know little of hospital history, but I doubt if there is much that overshadows Porter's experience upon the bluff overlooking the Little Big Horn. If I had the genius of a Buchanan Reed, I would weave it into a song more heroic than 'Sheridan's Ride.'"

Colonel Benteen said to him: "I know of no doctor in the regular corps who would have performed the work which Dr. Porter did, with his small force of assistants; don't think there was or is one in the army. There was no nonsense, no gush about him, only just a strict attention to duty, and as modest about it as a girl in her teens."

Dr. Porter's military service terminated in 1887, but at the opening of the war between Spain and this country he made the offer to present $50,000 to the government and either join the army as surgeon or serve in the ranks, which fact shows that the patriotic fire which once burned fervently within him has not yet died out. After leaving the service he engaged in the practice of his profession at Bismarck for some time, and for a year or so visited Washington, D. C., after a tour of the world in 1893-4. But there was a fascination for him in the scenes in which a stirring part of his career had been laid, and he returned to Bismarck, where he now resides.

In 1877 Dr. Porter was united in marriage with Miss Lottie Viets, of Oberlin, Ohio, a daughter of Henry Viets. She died in 1888, leaving one child, Henry V. In his political views the Doctor is a Republican, but takes no active part in party affairs. Socially he is a Mason of high degree. He has been president of the Medical Society of North Dakota; superintendent of the board of health of Burleigh county; vice-president of the board of examining surgeons for United States pensions at that point; and is now a member of the council of the Association of Acting Assistant Surgeons of the United States army, and vice-president of the Society of Veterans of the Indian Wars. He is a pleasant, genial and polished gentleman, of high social qualities and is very popular, having a most extensive circle of acquaintances who esteem him highly for his genuine worth. He has met with excellent success in life, becoming quite wealthy, and has traveled extensively, visiting all of Europe and a good part of Asia and Africa during the years of 1893 and 1894. He has climbed the Alps in Switzerland, and the Pyramids of Egypt. He rode a camel over the Nubian desert, and shot the cataracts of the Nile. He saw the Pope in Rome, the Sultan in Constantinople, witnessed bull fights in Spain, and the gambling tables of Monte Carlo. A month of sight-seeing in Paris gave him a pretty good insight into the mysteries of the gayest city in the world. Over a month in Rome, he had time to study art and ruins to a limited extent, but where a life time could be spent profitably exploring the wonders and mysteries of the Eternal city. After visiting Cairo and the two oldest cities in the world, Memphis and Thebes, he sailed from Alexandria to Joppa, then by rail to Jerusalem, and on horseback to Jericho, the Dead sea, and the river Jordan. He visited Bethlehem and saw the place where Christ was born, the Garden of Gethsemane, up the Mount of Olives, and through the valley of Jehosaphat. His trip through Palestine and Syria was made on horseback, camping at each place until everything had been seen. He camped, slept and lunched at Samaria, the plains of Jezreel, where Saul conquered the Philistines; also on the shore of the sea of Galilee, Nazareth, Capernaum and Damascus. He visited Cyprus, Rhodes and Turkey, where he saw the sultan going to prayers, and a review of ten thousand Turkish troops. He spent a week in Greece and Athens, returning again to Naples and Rome, thence through Spain, sailing from Gibraltar for home.

HON. JOSEPH M. DEVINE, lieutenant-governor of North Dakota, was born in Wheeling, West Virginia, March 15, 1861, a son of Hugh E. and Jane (McMurray) Devine, the former a native of Ireland, the latter of Virginia. His father was educated in Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland, and became a professor of botany. In 1830 he came to the United States with his parents and settled in Virginia. His death occurred at Wheeling in 1885. In his family were five sons, two of whom are now residents of North Dakota.

In West Virginia Joseph M. Devine grew to manhood, and was educated in the common and high schools of the city of Wheeling and afterward graduated in the classical course at the State University. The following year he came to North Dakota and located in La Moure county, where he followed farming for one year and still owns land, to the cultivation and improvement of which he yet devotes a part of his time and attention.

In 1886 he was elected county superintendent of schools, and most acceptably filled that office for ten years. He was made state lecturer for the schools of North Dakota in 1890 and still fills that position. He was made chief clerk of the fourth session of the legislature; in 1896 was elected lieutenant-governor and re-elected in 1898. He filled the office of governor from April, 1898, to January 1, 1899, after the death of Governor Briggs. His various official duties have been discharged in a most commendable and satisfactory manner and have gained for him the confidence and respect of all.

In 1896 he was elected one of the delegates to the republican national convention held at St. Louis, and was made one of the vice-presidents of that convention; also appointed one of the committee to notify the president of the action of the committee.

In 1897 he was made vice-president of the National Sound-Money League, which position is still held. In this capacity he has written several articles upon finance, which were published and copied extensively in eastern papers.

His work in behalf of education in North Dakota has been potent and far reaching. Much of the state's general system of education is due to his untiring efforts. In his capacity of state lecturer he has delivered many addresses on educational, literary and historical subjects, which have been received everywhere with popular approval and have been extensively commented upon, both in this state and others.

Since casting his first presidential ballot he has been an ardent supporter of the men and measures of the Republican party. At the age of twenty-two he left North Dakota and, at the special request of the Republican state executive committee, stumped his native state in the interests of the presidential campaign of that year. As a campaign speaker he is among the best in the west; his style been unusually clear, forceful and eloquent; his arguments always comprehensive and yet compact. Truth, passion, conviction and good judgment are the qualities that have made his public utterances powerful and effective. He believes what he says and his heart is always in his words. As a lecturer on literary and historical subjects he is always in demand, and, perhaps, in this field appears at his best. Instructive, interesting and entertaining, with a richness of illustration unsurpassed, and with a knowledge of the subject matter always full and complete and that evidences the hard student that he is.

Socially Mr. Devine is a thirty-second-degree Mason, a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias.

HON. PORTER J. McCUMBER is one of the most distinguished and honored citizens of Wahpeton and is now serving as United States senator from North Dakota. He is a prominent lawyer and belongs to that class whose ability and character are making a deep impression upon the public life of this rapidly developing community in which he resides. In this broad state, with its abundant room for individual enterprise, with its hearty appreciation of personal worth and its splendid opportunities for individual achievement, the man of ability finds the very largest sphere for usefulness and gratification for personal ambition. His abilities will be discovered; his integrity will find appreciation; his public spirit will meet with recognition, and he will be forced into prominence. Senator McCumber is an illustration of this fact.

He was born in Crete, Will county, Illinois, February 3, 1856, and spent his boyhood upon a farm near Rochester, Minnesota. After attending the district schools for some time, he entered the high school of that city, where he completed his literary education. He then taught school for a few years, and while thus employed took up the study of law. He graduated from the law department of the University of Michigan in 1880, and the following year opened an office at Wahpeton, North Dakota, where he has since successfully engaged in practice. In January, 1882, he formed a partnership with B. L. Bogart, and under the firm name of McCumber & Bogart they are still carrying on business.

On the 29th of May, 1889, at Wahpeton, Mr. McCumber was united in marriage with Miss Jennie Schorning, a native of Minnesota, and to them have been born two children, Helen and Donald. Socially Mr. McCumber is a member of Wahpeton Lodge, No. 56, F. & A. M., and politically is a staunch Republican. While in the line of his profession he has won distinction and success, he has always been ready to respond to any call for public duty, for years working on political lines for the advancement of the interests of the city, state and country. In 1884 he was elected to the lower house of the territorial legislature, and after serving in that body for one term was elected to the upper house in 1886 for the same length of time. He also filled the office of state's attorney for Richland county for one term, and in the winter of 1899 was chosen United States senator for a term of six years. With the broad spirit of Americanism shaping his views and prompting his actions, he has won the respect of all classes and the confidence of the great public. Men with minds that are as alert and broad as his, are never narrow; and men who, like him, view public questions, the social organization, politics and all the relations of life comprehensively and philosophically are magnificent supporters of the best interests of humanity.

JUDGE NEWTON C. YOUNG is a prominent and successful lawyer who is now serving as associate judge, and is the youngest jurist ever on the supreme bench in North Dakota. On his admission to the bar he located in Bathgate, this state, and it was not long before his abilities became widely recognized and he built up an excellent practice, which he continued to enjoy until appointed to his present responsible position. He is now living in Fargo.

Judge Young was born in Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, January 28, 1802, and is a son of Charles S. and Joanna E. (Williams) Young, both natives of Ohio. The father, who has followed farming throughout life, removed from Fulton county, Ohio, to Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, in 1849, and is now a resident of Fremont county, Iowa. The grandfather, William Young, was a native of Belfast, Ireland, and emigrated to America in 1810, locating in Pennsylvania. He, too, was a farmer.

During his boyhood and youth Judge Young was provided with excellent educational advantages. After attending the schools of Tabor, Iowa, he entered the Iowa City Academy from which he was graduated in 1822. He graduated from the Iowa State University in 1886, and from the law department of that institution in 1887. In June of that latter year, he opened an office in Bathgate, North Dakota, where was actively engaged in practice until appointed to fill the unexpired term of Judge G. C. Corless, on the supreme bench in 1898. This appointment was followed by his election in November, 1898, for a full term. Prior to this time he had filled some local positions, and was state's attorney of Pembina county from 1892 until 1896.

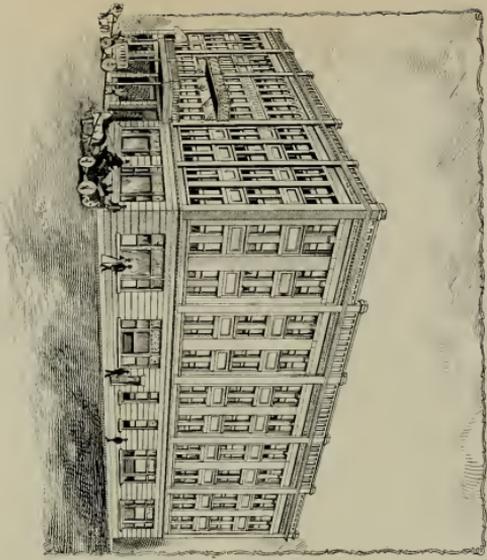

In 1887 Judge Young married Miss Ida B. Clarke, a native of Iowa City, and also a graduate of the State University located at that place. Her parents were Charles F. and Julia B. Clarke. Our subject and his wife have three children: Laura B., Horace C. and Dorothea P.

Fraternally the Judge is a member of the Masonic order, the Knights of Pythias and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is an ardent Republican and has served on the county and state committees. He is a genial, courteous gentleman, a pleasant, entertaining companion, and has many staunch and admiring friends among all classes. As an energetic, upright and conscientious lawyer and a gentleman of attractive social qualities, he stands high in the esteem of all who know him.

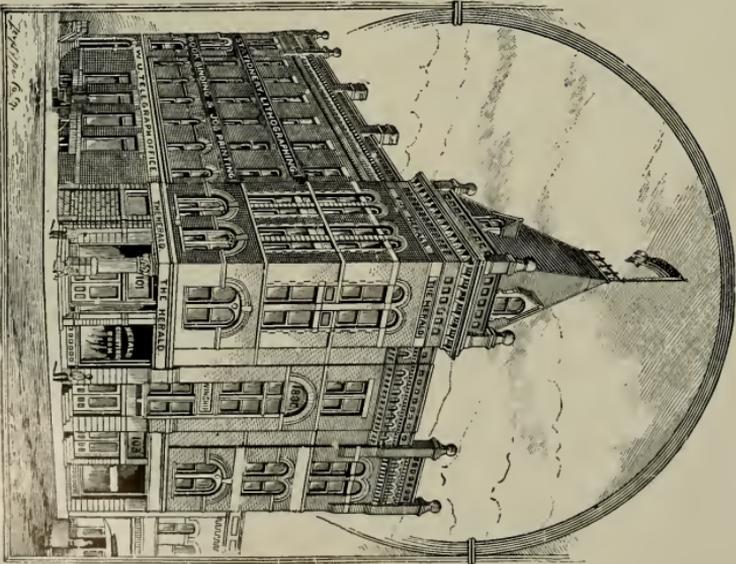

HON. GEORGE B. WINSHIP, founder and publisher of "The Herald," the leading daily paper west of the Twin cities, is one of the prominent men of North Dakota. He has devoted his attention to the growth and success of the "Herald," and after over twenty years of earnest labor has met with the success he so well deserves, and may well be proud of the results of his effort. Aside from his work in connection with the "Herald," he has found time to labor for the advancement and development of the social and financial resources of North Dakota, and is one of the well-known public-spirited men in the state. A portrait of Mr. Winship will be found in connection with this sketch.

Our subject was born in Saco, Maine, September 28, 1847, and emigrated to LaCrosse, Wisconsin, with his parents in 1851, and to LaCrescent, Houston county, Minnesota, six years later. He attended the district school until thirteen years of age, and then spent three years sanding brick molds, and setting type in the local printing office. He offered himself as a soldier for the Civil war in 1862, and was rejected on account of his youth, but in 1863 he was accepted and became a member of the Second Minnesota Cavalry, in which he served till the close of the war. He was then engaged at various employments, and in 1867 started to the Idaho gold fields with Captain Davy's expedition, but part of the outfit failed to arrive at Fort Abercrombie, and our subject, with others, declined to go on account of danger from hostile Indians, and he then spent a year driving a freight team from the end of the railroad at St. Cloud to the various posts for the government, and in the spring of 1868 he engaged with Dr. Schultz, of Winnipeg, (who later became lieutenant-governor of the province), and the work of our subject was on the "Norwester," then the only paper published north of St. Cloud. He remained there about two years and then went to Pembina and spent a year in the employ of A. W. Stiles, post trader. There he met William Budge, and in 1871, when the Blakeley & Carpenter line of stages from Breckenridge to Winnipeg was started, the two men formed a partnership, and established a stage station at Turtle river, fourteen miles north of Grand Forks, where Manvel is now located. They built rough stables for the accommodation of stage and other horses, and a rough log house furnished shelter for guests, and thus business prospered at Turtle river station. In 1873 Mr. Winship sold his interests to Budge and Eshelman, and went to St. Paul, where he stayed three years, setting type on all the prominent papers then established in the city. He moved to Caledonia, Minnesota, in the spring of 1877, and established the weekly "Courier," which he operated two years with success, and in 1879 he moved his plant to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and established the "Herald," and has remained here continuously since that date.

Our subject has taken an active interest in public affairs, and has served as state senator, to which position he was elected in 1889, being the first state senator from the seventh district, and gave his best energies for the interests of his community. In politics he is an ardent Republican, and the policy of the "Herald" has always been for the advancement of the principles of that party. Mr. Winship was married, in 1874, to Miss Mary J. Minshall, of La Crescent, Minnesota. Mr. and Mrs. Winship have one daughter now, Mrs. F. W. Weego, of Grand Forks. He is a member of the G. A. R. and Masonic fraternity.

JUDGE ALFRED DELAVAN THOMAS, deceased. That which records in perpetuity the names and the memory of great men, and secures to history the deeds that shape the course and policy of a state or nation, is a treasure valued by all who stand for purity and high attainments in the public service. A life history of the late Judge

Thomas will add luster to the brightest pages of the annals of the Dakotas, where the last twenty-three years of his life were spent, Fargo being his home from 1878 up to the time of his death, in 1896.

Judge Thomas was born in Walworth county, Wisconsin, August 11, 1837. His parents were Salmon and Elizabeth (Stowell) Thomas, both native of New York, and his grandfather, George Thomas, was born in Connecticut. Judge Thomas had two sisters and one brother—the two sisters are now living. In New York Salmon Thomas was a large land-owner, and in 1835 removed to Walworth county, Wisconsin, where his integrity and personal worth soon brought him into prominence. He served in the legislature of that state in 1847 and 1848, and was recognized as one of the leading public men of the state. He died in Walworth county September 27, 1887, and his wife died June 27, 1896.

Alfred D. Thomas grew to manhood in his native state, and received an unusually good primary education. He graduated from the Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, in the class of 1861, and was soon after elected district attorney of his home county of Walworth, Wisconsin, serving for six years. He began the study of law with the Hon. Alanson H. Barnes, of De'avan, Wisconsin, and finished his preliminary studies in the office of Butler & Cottrell, of Milwaukee. He devoted his entire attention to his profession as a lawyer, and being a great student, he continued after his graduation to pursue a course of self-education, and thus to equip his mind with these powers which afterward asserted themselves so effectively in the high duties he was called upon to discharge.

In February, 1877, Judge Thomas visited Dakota, intending to locate at Fargo, but accompanying Judge Barnes and other friends to the Black Hills, he there met Senator Hearst, who formed so favorable an impression of his acquirements and natural gifts that he offered him the position of regular attorney for the Homestake and other mining companies of California in which the Senator was interested. In this capacity he was associated with, or pitted against, such men as Colonel Harry Thornton, of San Francisco; Judge W. H. Clagett, of Idaho; Judge William Fullerton, of New York; Judge William C. Kingsley, of Denver, and Judge Bennett, of Salt Lake City, and during the five years of his professional services to these companies he proved himself at least the peer of these brilliant lights of the profession in the west. In 1883 he returned to Fargo and entered the practice of his profession there, but his fame as a lawyer and a man of integrity had reached far beyond the borders of his state, and in 1880 President Harrison appointed him United States district judge for the district of North Dakota. His known ability and peculiar fitness to deal with the judicial questions and conditions of the west added greatly to his labors, and he was called to preside in the federal courts at St. Paul, Topeka, Kansas City, Little Rock, Denver and various other points. His zeal for the service of his country was only equalled by his capacity to perform the duties of his high station.

Judge Thomas was a man of a genial nature, and his popularity was not a matter of wonder. His warm-hearted manner, combined with high attainments and force of character, won him friends and admirers wherever he went. While performing the stern duties of a federal judge, he was still a man of genuine sympathy, and while upholding the solemn dignity of the law, mercy was ever made a substitute for severity where the latter quality was not absolutely essential in the administration of justice. In his private life none could be purer, more sympathetic, more lovable; and in his face were registered the kindly, generous thoughts that sprang from the heart of a noble man. This narrative is for all to read, but in its lines, as in the features of his sympathetic face, only those of the little circle encompassed by his best love can read the inexpressible depths and truths of his life story. His death occurred August 8, 1896, within three days of his fifty-ninth birthday, surrounded by his family and friends, at his home in Fargo. His remains were taken back to his old home, Delavan, Wisconsin, where they rest in Spring Grove cemetery.

Judge Thomas' domestic life was a particularly happy one. He was married to Miss Fannie E. Barnes, daughter of A. H. Barnes, who was for eight years associate judge of the territory of Dakota. The marriage ceremony took place at Delavan, Wisconsin, in October, 1864. Mrs. Thomas died November 5, 1898, in Fargo, where their two daughters, Mrs. Lulu Thomas Wear and Mrs. Dr. C. E. Wheeler, reside. Their only son, Alfred B. Thomas, is a resident of Duluth, Minnesota.

HON. ELMER D. WALLACE, one of the most prominent men of Steele county, conducts an extensive agricultural business in Edendale township, and makes his home on section seven. There is probably no other man in that region who takes a more active interest in public affairs than Mr. Wallace, and he has served his county and state faithfully and well in various official positions and has gained the confidence and esteem of his fellow men.

Our subject was born in Macomb county, Michigan, July 5, 1844, and was the oldest son and second child in a family of four children born to Robert H. and Sylvia (Steward) Wallace. The family is of Scotch origin. When our subject was eight years of age the family removed to Detroit, where the father engaged in the general merchandise business.

Mr. Wallace was educated in the Detroit public and high schools, and at the age of fourteen years he was apprenticed to the druggist's trade. He entered the service of the Union army as a private August 13, 1862, and was soon afterward placed on the non-commissioned staff as hospital steward of the regiment, in which capacity, and as brigade hospital steward, he served about two years, when he was commissioned first lieutenant. After his return from the war he engaged for a time in the drug business, and later in the produce business, and in the spring of 1881 went to Dakota and secured land near his present home. He now operates a farm of one thousand eight hundred acres, and it is one of the best tracts in the county.

Our subject was married in 1871 to Miss Annie L. Briggs, a native of Michigan. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Wallace, as follows: Fannie and Clara. The latter is, at the date of this sketch, a student of the North Dakota University at Grand Forks. Mr. Wallace was elected a delegate to the constitutional convention for North Dakota in 1889, and took an active part in forming the constitution of the state. He served as chairman of the committee on public debts and public works, and as such was instrumental in fixing a low limit to the state debt, thus saving, as he thinks, millions of dollars to the people of the state. He was approved as candidate on the fusion ticket in 1892 for lieutenant-governor, and was elected by a large majority, and as president of the senate won the respect and confidence of his constituents. He supports the independent party in politics, and believes prohibition to be the proper policy for North Dakota.

JUDGE CHARLES F. AMIDON, United States district judge for the district of North Dakota, and a leading attorney of Fargo, was born in Clymer, Chautauqua county, New York, August 17, 1836, a son of John S. and Charlotte A. (Curtis) Amidon, also natives of New York. The grandfather, Leonard Amidon, was one of the first settlers of Chautauqua county, having located there in 1820. He followed the occupation of farming throughout life. The father was a United Brethren minister, who had charge of churches in both New York and Pennsylvania. He was a strong anti-slavery man, and before the Civil war assisted many a poor negro on his way to Canada and freedom, his home being a station on the famous underground railroad. He cast the first vote for the Free Soil party in Chautauqua county. He died in New York, October 2, 1898, but the mother is still living. They were the parents of eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom the oldest son served for four and a half years in a New York regiment during the Rebellion.

Judge Amidon was educated in New York. He prepared for college at the Corry high school, and in 1878 entered Hamilton College, Clinton, New York, from which he was graduated in June, 1882. The following August he came to Fargo, North Dakota, and for a year was principal of the high school at this place. He then entered the law office of Thomas & Benton, as a student, and in 1886 was admitted to the bar. In January, 1887, he began practice as a member of the firm of Amidon & Bradley, which partnership existed until 1889, when the firm became Benton, Amidon & Bradley. Subsequently it was Benton & Amidon until 1896, when our subject was appointed judge to succeed Judge A. D. Thomas, deceased. He was appointed city attorney in 1890, and held that office for two terms, and in 1893 was appointed a member of the commission to revise the codes, the present codes being the result of their work.

In 1892 Judge Amidon led to the marriage altar Miss Beulah R. McHenry, of Fargo, and to them have been born three children: Beulah E., Charles C. and John M. The Judge is a member of the Unitarian society of Fargo, and is what may be termed a gold Democrat. Before his appointment as judge, he took an active interest in political affairs, and delivered many addresses throughout the county and state in the interest of his party. The place he won in the legal profession is accorded him in recognition of his skill and ability, and the place he occupies in the social world is a tribute to that genuine worth and true nobleness of character which are universally recognized and honored.

WILLIAM BUDGE, the efficient postmaster of Grand Forks, North Dakota, is a pioneer settler of that region. He was born in the north of Scotland, October 11, 1852.

The parents of our subject, John and Jean (Budge) Budge, were natives of Scotland, and the father was a farmer and died in Scotland and the mother afterward emigrated to America, and died in this country.

Our subject remained in his native place until he was sixteen years of age, and in 1869 came to Northwest territory, with the Hudson's Bay Company, and was employed by that company one year in the Northwest territory. He went to Pembina, North Dakota, in 1870, and began work for W. C. Nash, in the brick yard and after the summer* went to Turtle river, and there built a station for the stage company with George Winship, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere. They operated the place three seasons, and in 1874 he went to Grand Forks, and has since made his home in that city. He went to the Black Hills in 1876, and was engaged in freighting from Bismarck, and was thus engaged two years. He started a store at Kelly's Point, and conducted the same for some time, and then returned to Grand Forks and engaged in the real estate business. He was chairman of the county board in 1875, and in 1880 was appointed sheriff and resigned after six months' service in that capacity. He has served as a member of the board of trustees of the State University, and was appointed postmaster at Grand Forks in July, 1898. He also conducts a grain and commission business in Grand Forks and is well-to-do. He was one of the directors of the Citizens' National Bank, and was president of the same for some time. He was also once interested in the First National Bank.

Our subject was married in 1890 to Miss Minnie Grow, a native of New York. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Budge, who bear the names of Alexander and Jean. He was a member of the constitutional convention, and holds membership in the Masonic fraternity, Knights of Pythias and Elks. He is a staunch Republican politically.

JUDGE JOSEPH M. BARTHOLOMEW. In the last half of the present century the lawyer has been a pre-eminent factor in all affairs of private concern and national importance. He has been depended upon to conserve the best and permanent interests of the whole people and is a recognized power in all the avenues of life. He stands as the protector of the rights and liberties of his fellowmen, and is the representative of a profession whose followers, if they would gain honor, fame and success, must be men of merit and ability. Such a one is Judge Bartholomew, who occupies the supreme bench of North Dakota, winning high commendation by his fair and impartial administration of justice.

He was born in the village of Clarksville, McLean county, Illinois, June 17, 1843, a son of George M. and Catherine (Heffner) Bartholomew, natives of Indiana and Virginia, respectively. The maternal grandfather, Michael Heffner, was a planter of the Old Dominion. Major-General Joseph Bartholomew, the paternal grandfather, was born in New Jersey, March 15, 1766, but was only two years old when with the family he removed to Laurel Hill, Pennsylvania, where his father soon died. His mother afterward married again, and as his stepfather was unkind to the children, he soon left home to make his own way in the world. As soon as he was able to carry a rifle he enlisted in the Revolutionary army and assisted in driving back the marauding Indians and breaking up Tory camps. After the close of the war he joined General Wayne's forces in his campaign against the northwest Indians. In 1790 he married Christiana Pickenpaugh, by whom he had ten children. He became a pioneer of McLean county, Illinois, and was in many engagements with the Indians in early days. He died in Money Creek township, McLean county, November 2, 1840. The father of Judge Bartholomew was educated for a civil engineer, but on account of failing health took up the occupation of farming. In 1830 he removed from Indiana to Illinois, and in 1845 became a resident of Lodi, Columbia county, Wisconsin. There he died in 1884, and his wife in 1890, honored and respected by all who knew him. In their family were eight children, three sons and five daughters, but our subject is the only one of the family now living in North Dakota.

Judge Bartholomew obtained his early education in the common schools of Wisconsin, and later attended the State University. During the Civil war he enlisted in August, 1862, in Company H, Twenty-third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and in March, 1865, was transferred to Company I, Forty-ninth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers. He participated in the battles of Chickasaw Bayou and Arkansas Post; the engagements around Vicksburg and the siege of that city, and the siege of Jackson, Mississippi. Subsequently his command was transferred to the department of the Gulf and he was under General Banks in the Red river campaign, where the regiment suffered badly. He aided in capturing the forts at the mouth of Mobile bay, and from that time until mustered out was on duty in Missouri and St. Louis. Fortunately the Judge was never wounded nor taken prisoner and only lost ten days from illness during his entire service. He was mustered out as first lieutenant of his company, November 14, 1865.

Returning to his home in Wisconsin, Judge Bartholomew commenced the study of law under Senator Allison, of Iowa, and was admitted to the bar in 1869, after which he engaged in practice at Lodi, Wisconsin, for four years. From there he went to Red Oak, Iowa, where he resided for eight years, and in 1883, came to Dakota territory, locating in LaMoure, LaMoure county, where he was successfully engaged in the practice of law until elected chief justice in 1889, being one of the first three members elected. He also served as state's attorney in LaMoure county in 1887.

In 1878 Judge Bartholomew was united in marriage with Miss Mary S. Harrington, a native of Loudoun county, Virginia, and a daughter of Samuel C. and Laura (Phelps) Harrington, and by this union one daughter has been born, Fredonia. Socially the Judge is a thirty-second-degree Mason, and a prominent member of the Grand Army of the Republic. He has always affiliated with the Republican party and has taken a most influential and active part in public affairs. He assisted in organizing the state, and has become one of its leading and distinguished men, holding a high position in the hearts of the people. He is widely known and has been very successful. With a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the fundamental principles of law, he combines a familiarity with statutory law and a sober, clear judgment, which makes him not only a formidable adversary in legal combat, but has given him the distinction of being one of the ablest jurists of the state.

JUDGE SANFORD A. HUDSON. When, after years of long and honorable labor in some field of business, a man puts aside all cares to spend his remaining years in the enjoyment of the fruits of his former toil, it is certainly a well-deserved reward of his industry.

"How blest is he who crowns in shades like these A youth of labor with an age of ease."

wrote the poet, and the world everywhere recognizes the justice of a season of rest following an active period of business life. Judge Hudson is now living retired at his home in Fargo, North Dakota, and his history is one that shows the accomplishment of well-directed labor. A portrait of Judge Hudson is presented in connection with this sketch.

The Judge was born in Oxford, Massachusetts, May 16, 1817, and is a son of Amos and Mary (Fisk) Hudson, also natives of that state, where the father was engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods and in merchandising in early life. In 1828 he removed to Ellisburg, Jefferson county, New York, where he died ten years later. He had a family of nine children, seven sons and two daughters, but only three sons are now living. The grandfather, William Hudson, was born in Massachusetts, in 1751, and as a lieutenant in the Colonial army took an active part in some of the most important battles of the Revolutionary war.

Judge Hudson's early education, acquired in the common schools, was supplemented by a course at Union Academy, Belleville, Jefferson county, New York, and in 1846 he commenced the study of law in that county, being admitted to the bar at Utica, New York, in 1848. The same year he removed to Janesville, Wisconsin, in company with John R. Bennett, later a circuit judge of that state, and there he successfully engaged in practice for thirty-two years, acting as city attorney for some time. In 1881 he came to Fargo, North Dakota, as judge of the third judicial district, having United States jurisdiction, comprising the entire territory now composing North Dakota. He was appointed to that position by President Garfield, and most creditably filled the office for four years. He then engaged in private practice until 1892, since which time he has lived retired. He was a distinguished lawyer and jurist and enjoyed an excellent practice.

In October, 1847, Judge Hudson married Miss Sarah D. Campfield, a native of New York and daughter of John M. and Fanny (Harvey) Campfield, by whom he had five children, who are still living, namely: Francis L.; Theodore C., a clergyman in the Episcopal church; Harriet J.; Sanford H., an attorney in Benson, Minnesota, and Sarah C. The wife and mother died in Wisconsin in 1877. Her father, John M. Campfield, was a prominent lawyer of Jefferson county, New York. In his political affiliations the Judge was first a Whig and later a Republican. He assisted in organizing the latter party, and has taken an active and prominent part in promoting its interests. He stands deserved high in the esteem and confidence of his fellow citizens and is held in high regard by all who know him.

COL. WILLIAM C. TREUMANN. This gentleman is well known in Grafton and vicinity as a loyal citizen and successful business man. He is engaged in the abstract business and has the only set of abstract books in the county, and has been a resident of Grafton since 1884, and has been identified with the business interests of that thriving city since that date.

Our subject was born near Hamburg, in the province of Holstein, Germany, December 14, 1862, and is a son of August and Anna (Koenig) Treumann, both of whom were natives of the same province. The mother died in 1872, and in the same year the father and our subject and sister emigrated to America and settled near Defiance, Ohio. The father was a sailor and ship carpenter in Germany, and in 1873 they moved to LeSueur county, Minnesota, and there the father entered the employ of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railroad Company, and was killed at Mankato, in 1899, while in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. Treumann was reared and educated in Minnesota, and worked in a mercantile establishment and kept books, and November 15, 1881, he came to Grand Forks, and began keeping books for a mercantile firm and filled that position for some time. He assumed charge of the branch store of the firm at Grafton in 1884, and continued with the house until 1885, when he engaged in the collection and loan business, and also served as deputy register of deeds. He began abstracting in 1888 and has continued in this business since, with marked success. He became a member of a military company in 1885, and was elected second lieutenant, and in 1887 the company became Company C, of the National Guard of North Dakota. He was lieutenant-colonel of the First North Dakota Volunteer Infantry, and had command of the regiment during the campaign in the Philippines. He also commanded a brigade on several occasions and had command of the transport Grant on the return to this country. The regiment was in thirty-seven engagements, including the battles of Manila in August, 1898 and February, 1899, and Mr. Treumann was with his regiment in all battles with the exception of those of the Santa Cruz expedition, when only a part of the regiment went. He escaped without wounds and served eighteen months and was then mustered out as lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, September 25, 1899, and at once returned home and resumed his business in Grafton. He was brevetted colonel of volunteers, upon the recommendation of General Lawton.

Our subject was married November 29, 1888, to Miss Elizabeth Baird, a native of Canada. Mr. and Mrs. Treumann are the parents of three children, as follows: William K., Oscar B., and Agnes E., all of whom are living. Mr. Treumann is a member of the Masonic fraternity in all branches, the Knights of Pythias, and Foresters, and was master of the North Dakota Military Lodge at Manila. Politically he is a Republican.

HON. BURLEIGH F. SPALDING, member of congress from North Dakota, has attained distinction as one of the ablest members of the Fargo bar. In this profession probably more than in any other success depends upon individual merit, upon a thorough understanding of the principles of jurisprudence, a power of keen analysis, and the ability to present clearly, concisely and forcibly the strong points in his case. Possessing these necessary qualifications, Mr. Spalding is accorded a foremost place in the ranks of the profession in this state, and stands today one of the most esteemed members of the Fargo bar.

He was born in Orleans county, Vermont, December 3, 1853, and is a son of Rev. Benjamin P. and Ann (Folsom) Spalding, also natives of the Green Mountain state. As a Methodist Episcopal minister the father engaged in preaching in Vermont and New Hampshire for many years, but is now living retired with our subject, having come to North Dakota in 1882. The paternal grandfather, Noah Spalding, was a school teacher of Vermont, and was a politician of some note, while the maternal grandfather, Rev. Moses Folsom, was a Free Baptist minister of New Hampshire and Vermont. The Folsom family was founded in the United States in 1638, the Spalding in 1619. Our subject has one brother and two sisters. The brother is now living in Salt Lake City, Utah. The elder sister lives in Traill county, and the younger is a professor in Pomona College, California.

In his native state, Burleigh F. Spalding was reared and educated until eleven years of age, when he left home, and for five years worked on farms in New Hampshire and Vermont for his board and clothes and the privilege of attending school. At sixteen he engaged in clerking in a country store for forty-eight dollars per year, but later received seventy-two. For some time he worked at St. Johnsbury, Vermont, and then attended the Lyndon Literary Institute, and later the Norwich University, from which he was graduated with the degree of B. Ph., in 1877. The following year he taught in an academy at Albany, Vermont, and next read law for two years with Gleason & Field at Montpelier. He was admitted to the bar in Vermont, March 15, 1880. He served as clerk of the state legislature in 1878.

On the 31st of March, 1880, Mr. Spalding came to Fargo, North Dakota, and for one year was in partnership with S. G. Roberts in the practice of law. Later he succeeded to the entire practice of the firm and admitted Charles F. Templeton to a partnership. That connection continued for six and a half years, or until Mr. Templeton was appointed judge of the Grand Forks district. In 1891 George H. Phelps became a member of the firm, and in June, 1893, Mr. Newman was also taken in, but in 1897 Mr. Phelps retired, and business was then carried on under the name of Newman & Spalding until 1898, when Mr. W. S. Stambaugh was admitted to the firm and the name was changed to Newman, Spalding & Stambaugh. This is one of the strongest law firms in the state, and they enjoy a large and lucrative practice.

On the 25th of November, 1880, Mr. Spalding was united in marriage with Miss Alida Baker, of Vermont, a daughter of David and Emily (Cutler) Baker, and by this union five children have been born, namely: Deane B., Frances F., Roscoe C., Burleigh M. and Carlton C.

Mr. Spalding organized the Merchants' State Bank of Fargo, which was started as the Dakota Savings Bank, and re-organized in 1890. He served as its first president, and is quite prominent in business as well as professional circles. During his residence in this state he has taken a very important part in public affairs and is a recognized leader in political circles. He served as superintendent of public instruction from 1882 to 1884, and in 1883 was elected a member of the board of commissioners to relocate the capital. In 1889 he was elected to the constitutional convention, served on the judicial, school and public lands committees, and was also a member of the joint committee to divide the archives and property of the states. In 1898 he was nominated and elected a member of congress over the Fusion (Democratic, Populist and Silver Republican) candidate by a majority of 9,932 votes, and is now most creditably and satisfactorily filling that position. He has been a delegate to nearly all the state and territorial conventions of the Republican party during his residence here, and in 1896 was chairman of the committee on resolutions. He was chairman of the Republican state central committee in 1892 and was a member of the same for three years. In 1896 he was elected to the same position from Cass county, and has taken a prominent part in campaign work, being a strong and able debater and an orator of note. He is a thirty-second-degree Mason, a Knight Templar and a member of the Sons of the American Revolution. Socially he is deservedly popular, as he is affable and courteous in manner and possesses that essential qualification to success in public life, that of making friends readily and strengthening the ties of all friendships as time advances.

RUSSELL W. S. BLACKWELL, residing in LaMoure, LaMoure county, is one of the leading attorneys of North Dakota. He is the present state's attorney of LaMoure county, and is a man whose qualifications and character are befitting one of his station. He is affable, intelligent and possessed of an active public spirit and casts his influence for the better interests of those around him, and is highly esteemed in turn by the people. He was born in the village of Pocasset, on the east side of Buzzard's bay, in the town of Sandwich, Barnstable county, Massachusetts, August 20, 1853.

The father of our subject, Russell Blackwell, was born in Monument, Massachusetts, and was of English-Puritan descent. He was a sea captain in the American merchant marine service, and his forefathers followed the seas for two and a half centuries. He died at Bourne, November 17, 1898, aged seventy-five years. He was a man of more than ordinary ability, and was one of the prominent men in his native town. The mother of our subject, who bore the maiden name of Lydia B. Phinney, was also a native of Monument, Massachusetts, and survives her husband, and is living in the old home. Five children were born to this worthy couple, as follows: Elisha B., now engaged in the Alaskan trade at Seattle, Washington; Ada, now Mrs. Dr. Robert Newman, of New York City; Lillie, now Mrs. E. S. Ellis, residing with her mother; Lydia A., who died at the age of twenty months; and Russell W. S. our subject.

Mr. Blackwell, when about one year of age went with his parents to Monument, Massachusetts, where he attended school for some time, and in the fall of 1868 removed to New York City, where he entered the grammar school and continued his studies in that city until 1873, when he accepted a position as principal of the public school at Foxboro, Massachusetts. After one year he engaged in the job printing business, and conducted the same from November, 1874, to 1881, when he disposed of the plant. During that time he continued the study of law which had been commenced in New York City in 1870, and October 6, 1881, was admitted to the bar at Dedham, Massachusetts, and in 1882 he returned to New York City. He had thoroughly familiarized himself with the practice of his profession by handling many cases prior to his admission to the bar, and his success was assured. He, however, engaged in the mercantile business in New York until 1892, when he went to North Dakota. He visited Jamestown, North Dakota, in April of that year, and began farming near there, conducting the farm during three summers and returning to New York, where he taught the grammar school No. 16, during the winter terms. He removed to the town of LaMoure, November 8, 1894, and engaged in the practice of law, in connection with which he conducts a real estate and general brokerage business, and during the year 1894 he was elected to the office of state's attorney.

Mr. Blackwell was married at Foxborough, Massachusetts, in 1874, to Mrs. Fannie Thomas, a native of that state. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Blackwell, as follows: Waldo R., now practicing law in New York City, having graduated from the University of New York in the class of 1895, with the degree of Bachelor of Law; and Grace W., who died in infancy. Mr. Blackwell has always labored earnestly for the better interests of his community, and while a resident of Foxboro, Massachusetts, was appointed justice of the peace by the governor of that state, which office he held seven years, after which he was re-appointed. He was elected a member of the school committee in 1878, and was re-elected in the same capacity in 1881, and chairman of the board, serving until his resignation in 1882. Since taking up his residence in Dakota he has been chosen a member of the board of insanity commissioners and is the treasurer of the North Dakota Bar Association. He was nominated for state's attorney on the Republican ticket and endorsed by the Populist party. He is a man who is popular with the people as a public officer regardless of party affiliations, and is deserving of much credit for his labors for the public good. He is a member of Crystal Wave lodge, A. F. & A. M., of Brooklyn, Corneau Consistory of New York City, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and Knights of Macca-bees.

FRED FALLEY. America owes much of her progress and advancement to a position foremost among the nations of the world to her newspapers, and in no line has the incidental broadening out of the sphere of usefulness been more marked than in this same line of journalism. North Dakota has enlisted in the newspaper field some of the strongest intellects in the state—men of broad mental grasp, cosmopolitan ideas and notable business sagacity. Prominent among these is Fred Falley, the present secretary of state, and editor of the "Wahpeton Globe."

He was born in York, Clay county, Illinois, July 1, 1859, a son of Richard and Louisa (Scranton) Falley, natives of Massachusetts and Illinois, respectively. The father, who was a wagon-maker by trade, removed to Illinois in 1842, and there died in 1877. The mother departed this life in the same state in 1868. Our subject received a good high-school education in his native county, and during his youth learned the printer's trade at Lancaster, Wisconsin, under Edward Pollock, who was then publishing the "Grant County Herald." Coming to North Dakota in 1880, he located at Wahpeton, where he worked at his trade about four years. In 1883 he founded the "Sargent County Teller" at Milnor, North Dakota, and conducted that paper until 1887, when he purchased the "Wahpeton Globe," which he is still successfully carrying on. It is one of the best papers published in the state and is the Republican organ of Richland county.

In 1885 Mr. Falley married Miss Clara Mitchell, who died in 1892, leaving one son, Richard M. He was again married in 1896, his second union being with Mrs. Sadie Pyatt, by whom he has one son, Morgan. Fraternally Mr. Falley is a member of the Masonic order, the Knights of Pythias and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and politically he is a pronounced Republican. He served as secretary of the state senate for several sessions, and in 1896 was elected secretary of state and re-elected in 1898. He has proved a most efficient and popular officer, and during his incumbency has made a host of warm friends throughout the state.

COLONEL WILLIAM H. ROBINSON, treasurer and general manager of the Beidler & Robinson Lumber Company, with headquarters at Mayville, is a gentleman of much executive ability and is widely known as an intelligent and public-spirited citizen. He is identified with various financial enterprises in that part of the state, and has made a success of life, winning his way upward by energetic efforts and faithful service.

Our subject was born in Chicago, Illinois, October 21, 1843, and was the eldest of a family of five children born to Henry and Jane (Hutchings) Robinson. His parents were natives of England, and the mother still lives at Albert Lea, Minnesota. After entering upon his business career Mr. Robinson was called to defend his country, and enlisted, in 1861, in Company F, Thirty-ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. Returning from the war, he began clerking for J. Biedler Lumber Company in Chicago, and was with that firm about twelve years, and in 1876 began for himself in Allerton, Iowa, and in 1882 disposed of his Iowa interests and arrived at Portland, Dakota, in May, and under the firm name of Beidler & Robinson established the lumber business at Portland, and in 1885 the firm of Beidler & Robinson Lumber Company was incorporated. They now own twenty-six lumber yards in North Dakota and Minnesota. Soon after the incorporation of the company the headquarters were taken up in Mayville, and the business of the company has been more than successful. Mr. Robinson is also junior member of the firm of Dibley & Robinson, dealers in steel combination and wood bridges, the firm having headquarters at Fargo. Mr. Robinson is also Indian trader at Standing Rock agency at Fort Yates, North Dakota.

Our subject was married in 1870 to Miss Lillian Abbott, of Chicago. One daughter was born to this union, who is now Mrs. R. H. Bush, of Grand Forks. Mr. Robinson was married in 1896 to Miss Edith Anderson. Mr. Robinson was a member of the senate in the first state legislature, and did very efficient work toward passing the prohibition bill through the senate. He also assisted in securing the location of the State Normal at Mayville. He is prominent in public affairs, and has been prominently identified with the Republican party of the state; was a delegate to the Minneapolis national convention, and attended the St. Louis convention and was there elected national committeeman for North Dakota. He was chairman of the state central committee during three campaigns, and at present is chairman of the state central committee and a member of the national committee. Mr. Robinson is a Knight Templar and thirty-second-degree Mason, and also holds membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

ALBERT N. CARLBLOM, the present well-known state auditor of North Dakota, and a recognized leader in the ranks of the Republican party, was born in Cokato, Wright county, Minnesota, December 17, 1865, a son of John G. and Elizabeth (Anderson) Carlblom, both natives of Sweden. The father, who was a farmer by occupation, came to the United States in 1864, and settled in Wright county, Minnesota, where he followed his chosen calling until 1881, when he became a resident of Sargent county, North Dakota, making his home there until called from this life in 1899. His wife had passed away in 1898. To them were born seven children, five sons and two daughters, all living in either North Dakota or Minnesota.

Our subject acquired his early education in the common schools of his native state and then entered Gustavus Adolphus College, St. Peter, Minnesota, from which he was graduated in 1886. Prior to coming to this state with his parents in 1881, he had engaged in teaching school in Minnesota, and later followed the same profession in Sargent county. He also engaged in farming and clerking for some time. In 1889 he was appointed deputy county treasurer of Sargent county for two years, and in 1891 was made deputy auditor of the same county. He was elected auditor in 1892, and so creditably and satisfactorily did he fill the office that he was re-elected in 1894 and again in 1896. In 1898 he was elected state auditor on the Republican ticket and entered upon the duties of the office January 3, 1899. His public duties have always been most promptly and faithfully discharged, winning the commendation of even his political enemies, and he has proved a most popular official.

On the 23d of March, 1898, Mr. Carlblom married Miss Josephine Peterson, also a native of Minnesota. They are the parents of one daughter, Vera Leonore. Mr. and Mrs. Carlblom are members of the Lutheran church. The Republican party has always found in him a staunch supporter of its principles, and he has been a member of both state and county committees, and has served as president and secretary of the Sargent County Republican League. He is widely and favorably known and has many friends throughout the state.

HON. DENNIS W. DRISCOLL. Success is determined by one's ability to recognize opportunity, and to pursue this with a resolute and unflagging energy. It results from continued labor, and the man who thus accomplishes his purpose usually becomes an important factor in business circles and in public life. Through such means Mr. Driscoll, state treasurer, has attained a leading place among the representative men of North Dakota, and his well-spent and honorable life commands the respect of all who know him. A portrait of Mr. Driscoll will be found in this volume.

He was born in Canada, September 22, 1849, and is a son of John J. and Julia (Dennison) Driscoll, natives of Canada. The parents were married in Canada, where the father died during the infancy of our subject, and in 1856 the mother removed to Detroit, Michigan. There our subject was reared and educated and also learned the potter's trade, which he followed until 1873. In 1870 he removed to Boone county, Iowa, where he worked at his trade for a time, and in 1875 became a resident of La Crosse, Wisconsin, where he was first engaged in selling farm implements and later traveled for the Deering Company.

Coming to North Dakota in 1879, Mr. Driscoll located in Pembina, Pembina county, where he became a member of the firm of Johnson, Hohner & Company, agricultural implement dealers. When Walsh county was formed, in 1881, he went to Acton in the interest of the same company. In 1881 he took up his residence at Grafton, continuing in the employ of the same company until 1887. He was next engaged in farming and stock raising for eight years and then returned to Grafton, where he still makes his home. He is now engaged in the real estate business, is vice-president of the Grafton National Bank, and president of the Bates Carbon Book Company of that place. In business affairs he is prompt and notably reliable, and has met with most excellent success.

In 1882 Mr. Driscoll led to the marriage altar Miss Clara K. Hogg, a native of Nova Scotia, and to them have been born four children, namely: William J., Charles H., Nellie H. and Clara K., all living. Since attaining his majority Mr. Driscoll has always cast his ballot with the Republican party, and although he has never been an office seeker, he was elected, in 1898, to the office of state treasurer, carrying every county in the commonwealth. Socially he is a Royal Arch Mason, and is held in high esteem by all who know him. The farm of Mr. Driscoll, which consists of fourteen hundred acres, is located in Acton township, Walsh county, and is devoted to grain and stock interests.

HON. ASA SERGEANT, one of the first settlers of Traill county, is a gentleman who commands respect wherever he is known. He has spent a useful career in North Dakota, and is one of the wealthy and influential citizens of Caledonia, and operates several hundred acres of rich land.

Our subject was born in Peacham, Caledonia county, Vermont, August 5, 1844, and was the fourth in a family of six children born to Elijah and Sylvia (Watts) Sargeant, both of whom are deceased. He enlisted in the fall of 1862 in Company F, Fifteenth Vermont Infantry, and after a short service returned to his native state. In 1868, during the first "boom" of the Red river country, he and some relatives invested in land on the Minnesota side of the Red river, and in 1870 our subject went to look at the land purchased. He worked during the season in Minnesota and passed the winter in Pembina. In the spring of 1872 and he entered the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company, working in the store at Georgetown, and soon afterward was established in a store at Caledonia, and later for three years at Walla Walla. In association with C. M. Clark, he rented the Caledonia flouring mills in 1876 and later they purchased the plant. The mill was erected in 1872, and was the second mill built in what is now North Dakota. The frame of the structure is of oak, hewn from the native timber, and the whole building is as sound as when erected thirty years ago. The mill was sold some years afterward, but was repurchased by Mr. Sargeant and Edward Braseth. They are running the mill at the present time. It is a one hundred-barrel capacity mill, and is run by steam and water power combined. Our subject now owns seven hundred acres of land, bounded on two sides by the Goose and the Red rivers. He is now planning a departure to the Pacific coast to join his family and remain there for some time, and perhaps make his home there.

Our subject was married in 1879 to Miss Amanda Houghton, who went to Dakota in 1876. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Sargeant, as follows: Vie, a student of music and also a teacher of music; Charles, a student of Pacific University, of Oregon; Helen, deceased; Martha; Ray, deceased, and Neal. Mr. Sargeant was elected to the territorial legislature in 1876, which met at Yankton, and he was appointed by the governor among the first county officers, as both probate judge and county treasurer. In the fall of 1886 he was elected county register of deeds and served three terms. He is one of the solid men of Traill county and is well and favorably known throughout the state of North Dakota.

MAJOR ALANSON WILLIAM EDWARDS. Colonel Cadle, adjutant-general of the Seventeenth Corps, commanded by the brave, popular and genial General Frank Blair, in the following letter to "The Forum," has some words for an old comrade and explains how he comes to write:

"Society of the Army of the Tennessee, Recording Secretary's office, P. O. box 35, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 31, 1898.—To 'The Forum': The Society of the Army of the Tennessee desires to keep in its records memoranda showing the services of their members. Some time ago I wrote to Major Edwards and asked him to send me a sketch that would enable us, when he died, to print his obituary. He sent me a very brief statement, but knowing as much, or more, of his record than he modestly stated to me, I have written the enclosed, and if you think it worth while it might be printed, because it shows a great deal of his experience in the Army of the Tennessee in the war of the Rebellion.

"He was certainly a gallant soldier in our army, and credit should be given to living men as well as dead. Therefore, I send this to you with the hope that it may be used, and that, as an obituary of our society, it may be long before it will be required. Major Edwards does not know of this communication. Yours very truly,

"CORNELIUS CADLE."

"Major Alanson William Edwards was born in Lorain county, Ohio, August 27, 1840. His father removed to Macoupin county, Illinois, in 1848. Major Edwards attended the county schools and was afterward, in 1856-57, a student at McKendree College, Illinois. He was a railroad express agent and telegraph operator at Gillespie, Illinois, when the war broke out.

"He enlisted at once for the three months' service, but the quota of Illinois was then filled, as was the first call for three years' volunteers. He enlisted and was mustered in as a private of Company I, One Hundred and Twenty-second Illinois Infantry, at Camp Palmer, Carlinville, Illinois, August 4, 1862. He served in the Western army, beginning at Columbus, Kentucky. He was a clerk in the office of the adjutant-general, district of Jackson war department, General Grenville M. Dodge, of Corinth, Mississippi.

"In April, 1863, by authority from the war department, General Grenville M. Dodge, at Corinth, Mississippi, organized the First Alabama Union Cavalry from loyal refugees, driven from their homes in the mountains in north Alabama by Confederate conscripting officers. Major Edwards was appointed first lieutenant and adjutant, with George E. Spencer as colonel, and was afterward promoted to captain L troop of this regiment.

"He served with General Van Derveer as acting assistant adjutant-general, district of Rome and of Marietta, Georgia, and was near Kenesaw mountain with General Sherman when Sherman signalled Corse at Allatoona to 'hold the fort,' at the same time that Captain Flint, of Company E, First Alabama Cavalry, was aide to General Corse, and wrote at Corse's dictation the answer about 'losing his cheek, but was able to whip all hell yet.'

"Major Edwards commanded Company M of his regiment on the 'March to the sea,' and in the close approach to Savannah he rode with the First Alabama Cavalry over the torpedoes planted in the road by the enemy. Lieutenant F. W. Tupper, his successor and adjutant of the regiment, having his leg blown off, and many of the regiment were severely wounded.

"Colonel Cornelius Cadle, the adjutant-general of the Seventeenth Army Corps, being that moment in advance with the First Alabama Cavalry, directed the provost marshal of the corps, Major John C. Marvin, to bring to the front all the prisoners of war, and they, upon their hands and knees, dug into the ground and took out the torpedoes—the unexploded ones—that several of these prisoners had assisted in 'planting' a few days before. It happened that the Confederate sergeant who had supervision of the placing of these torpedoes was one of the prisoners, and he readily found them and carefully aided in clearing our way to Savannah, the city that was a Christmas present from Sherman to our president, Lincoln.

"At Savannah Major Edwards was detached from his regiment by order of General Sherman, and assigned to duty as acting assistant adjutant-general, Fourth Division, Fifteenth Army Corps, and served with General Corse, the division commander, until after the grand review of the armies at Washington, May 24 and 25, 1865, and was mustered out July 11, 1865. He was breveted major March 13, 1865, for 'gallant and meritorious service in the field.'

"Major Edwards was present at the meeting of the officers of the Army of the Tennessee, called to organize our society at Raleigh, North Carolina, April 25, 1865.

"The first post of the Grand Army of the Republic was organized by Dr. B. F. Stevenson, at Decatur, Illinois, and several members were sent over the state to institute other posts. A dozen or so were mustered at the same time. Major Edwards, after his war service, was mustered in Post No. 6, at Bunker Hill, Illinois, which was one of the earliest organized posts of the Grand Army of the Republic.

"Returning to his home in 1865, he resuscitated the 'Union Gazette,' at Bunker Hill, Illinois, a paper he published before going to the war, and which was suspended during the war. In 1868 Major Edwards secured an interest in the 'Carlinville Free Democrat,' a Republican paper started by Senator John M. Palmer in 1856.

Major Edwards was warden of the Illinois State Penitentiary at Joliet in 1871-1872. After the great Chicago fire he went into business in Chicago, and was a member of the board of trade in 1875-1878. He went to the Black Hills in 1876, located at Fargo in 1878, as editor of the 'Fargo Republican.' He established the 'Daily Argus' in 1879. Governor G. A. Pierce, of our society, appointed Major Edwards superintendent of the semi-decennial census of Dakota territory in 1885. Major Edwards was elected mayor of Fargo in 1886-7; was a member of the legislature 1895-6. He lost 'The Argus' in 1890, started the 'Daily Forum' in 1891, purchased the 'Republican,' the first paper he started, and consolidated the two, and it is now issued by Edwards & Plumley.

"Major Edwards was married to Elizabeth Robertson at Carlinville, Illinois, in 1870. They have six sons and one daughter, all living in Fargo, North Dakota. The sons are Harry Goodell, twenty-six years; William Robertson, twenty-three years; Alanson Charles, nineteen years; John Palmer, seventeen years; George Washington, thirteen years; Richard Roberts, nine years; and Marie R., twenty-four years.

"Cincinnati, Ohio, March 31, 1898."

MARSHALL HENRY JEWELL, publisher of the "Bismarck Tribune," the oldest newspaper in North Dakota—the weekly edition being established in June, 1873, and the daily in April, 1881—was born in Hector, on the banks of Seneca lake, in New York state, April 20, 1857. His father was a newspaper man, and back in the '50s published the "Seneca County Sentinel" at Ovid, New York. In 1858 Mr. Jewell's parents moved to Michigan and were among the early pioneers in the region north of Grand Rapids. Mr. Jewell, Sr., in order to support his family while making an "opening" in the pineries, worked much of the time at the printer's trade in Grand Rapids, the nearest town, walking through a dense forest a distance of over thirty miles every Saturday night to spend Sunday at home. These were the surroundings of the first ten years of the life of the subject of this sketch. Obtaining such education as was possible in the "old log school house," he attended school in the village of Cedar Springs. Mr. Jewell's parents moved to Wheaton, a suburb of Chicago, where Mr. Jewell attended the college for a brief period.

During his early school days in Cedar Springs Mr. Jewell found opportunity to work "after hours" in the "Clipper" office, and was thus enabled to learn the printer's trade. He went to Chicago and in 1876 was made foreman of the "Daily Courier," and later the telegraph editor of the "Telegraph," on whose presses the first issue of the "Daily News" was printed. Associated with Stanley Hunter, Mr. Jewell came to Bismarck in 1878 and secured control of the "Weekly Tribune" from its founder, Colonel C. A. Lounsbury. He was associated with these gentlemen a few years, succeeding to their interests in 1883. The "Bismarck Tribune" is now widely known as one of the leading and most influential newspapers in the Northwest, while the publishing department, which has handled the state printing since 1883, when the capital of Dakota was located in Bismarck, is one of the most complete of the kind in the country.

Mr. Jewell has always taken an active part in politics as well as business, and is a familiar figure and prominent factor in all state Republican gatherings. He was chosen secretary of the Republican state committee in 1893 and again in the McKinley campaign of 1896. He has a wife and one son, and owns one of the coziest homes in the capital city.

HENRY U. THOMAS. The world instinctively pays deference to the man whose success has been worthily achieved, who has acquired a high reputation in his chosen calling, and whose social prominence is not less the result of an irrefragable life than of recognized natural gifts. It is a pleasing indulgence to write the biography of a man of this character, such as Mr. Thomas is known to be. He is now serving with distinction as commissioner of agriculture and labor of North Dakota, and makes his home in Bismarck.

He was born in Magnolia, Rock county, Wisconsin, December 10, 1853, and is a son of Asaph U. and Mary C. (Flint) Thomas, the former a native of Springfield, Massachusetts, and the latter of Wethersfield, Connecticut. The father was a machinist by trade, but the latter part of his life was devoted to farming. From Massachusetts he removed to Pennsylvania, and in 1847 became a resident of Wisconsin, where he made his home for ten years and then went to Freeborn county, Minnesota. There he spent his remaining days and died in April, 1883. The wife and mother passed away in the same county in 1874. In their family were eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom our subject and all of the daughters are still living. The paternal grandfather, David Thomas, was born in Massachusetts, April 8, 1781, and died February 28, 1842. He had only one son, Asaph U., father of our subject.

Henry U. Thomas, of this review, grew to manhood in Minnesota, and the early education he acquired in the common schools of that state was supplemented by a course at the Adventist Seminary in Freeborn county. He continued to make his home in Minnesota, engaged in agricultural pursuits, until April, 1883, when he became a resident of Benson county, North Dakota, where he took up land from the government, becoming the first settler of Antelope valley, which he named. He lived there until the fall of 1885, when he was elected county commissioner and removed to Minnewaukon, the county seat. After filling that office very acceptably for two years he was appointed probate judge and served in that capacity for nine years, or until elected to his present office in 1896. His official duties have always been performed in a most commendable and satisfactory manner, and have gained for him the confidence and respect of all.

In January, 1889, Mr. Thomas was married in Fargo, North Dakota, to Miss Laura A. Spotts, a native of Ohio, and to them have been born seven children, namely: Merrill C., Paul C., Lyle J., Erma M., Harold U., William H. and an infant boy who died August 15, 1899. The wife and mother is a consistent member of the Congregational church, which Mr. Thomas also attends. He is a thirty-second-degree Mason, a Shriner, and a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In his political views he is an ardent Republican, and does all in his power for the success of his party. As a citizen he has at all times the good of the community at heart, and his abilities are exerted to make the state of his adoption one of the best in the Northwest.

HON. JOHN E. HAGGART. Few men are more prominent or more widely known in the enterprising city of Fargo and North Dakota than John E. Haggart, United States marshal for North Dakota. He has been an important factor in public affairs and his popularity is well deserved, as in him are embraced the characteristics of an unbending integrity, unabated energy and industry that never flags. He is public-spirited and thoroughly interested in whatever tends to promote the moral, intellectual and material welfare of his city, county or state.

Mr. Haggart was born in St. Lawrence county,

New York, April 19, 1846, a son of John and Mabel (Northrop) Haggart, also natives of the Empire state. The grandfather, Gilbert Haggart, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, and on his emigration to the United States located in New York, where he followed farming throughout life. The father was also an agriculturist, was major in the state militia, and was quite a prominent man in New York. He was twice married and had three sons.

Reared on the home farm in much the usual manner of farmer boys of his day, John E. Haggart was educated in the country schools. In 1863 he entered the employ of the government in the coast construction corps and spent about a year and a half with the Army of the Potomac, after which he returned to New York. In 1867 he came west and crossed the plains, starting from Leavenworth, Kansas. The following winter was spent in southern Colorado and New Mexico, and he then came to what is now Wyoming, where he conducted a lumber yard for the Union Pacific Railroad until 1870. In 1871 he landed four miles below the present city of Fargo, North Dakota, and in August of that year took up a claim on the Sheyenne river, which he improved and still owns. He is one of the most extensive land owners in the state, having nineteen hundred and sixty acres in all in the home farm. He raises from thirty-five to forty thousand bushels of wheat annually, and in 1898 harvested thirty-seven thousand seven hundred fifty bushels. He was one of the thirteen to organize and put in operation the Fargo Southern Railroad, of which he was a director, and is always willing to support any enterprise for the good of the community.

In 1875 was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Haggart and Miss Betsy J. Hertsgaard, and to them have been born nine children, as follows: Gilbert W., Mabel E., Maggie I., John C., Estella M., Alexander M., George E., William H. R. and Daniel.

Mr. Haggart was the first man to be made a Mason in this state, being initiated into the order in 1873, since which time he has been made a Royal Arch Mason, a Knight Templar, a thirty-second-degree Scottish Rite Mason and a member of the A. A. O. of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. Since acquiring his majority he has been a staunch supporter of the Republican party and has served on the county and state central committees. In 1874 he was elected sheriff of Cass county and filled that office for twelve consecutive years in a most capable manner. He was elected the first city marshal of Fargo, and in 1889 was elected to the state senate, of which he was a prominent and influential member until 1898, when he resigned to accept his present office, that of United States marshal for North Dakota. He was well qualified to fill that office, as he had previously served as deputy for eight years. He has been called upon to fill a number of other public positions of honor and trust, being a member of the state prison board and other important boards. He also assisted in locating the Agricultural College at Fargo and has done much to help that institution, introducing in the senate all the bills in its behalf, including the one to secure the land on which the college has been erected. The part which he has taken in the development of the county and in advancing the interests of the state has impressed his name indelibly upon its records, and he well deserves mention among the honored pioneers and representative citizens.

HON. ANDREW SLOTTEN, a resident farmer of section 35, in Dwight township, is one of the influential men of Richland county. He has been associated with the public affairs of the vicinity since his earliest residence here, and has worked zealously for the development of his community. He has acquired a comfortable fortune and a good reputation by the exercise of honest efforts, and his home is one of the bright places in the township.

Mr. Slotten was born in Norway, September 16, 1840, and was the second in a family of five children born to Thore and Elizabeth Slotten. He was reared and educated in his native country and was engaged in farming there until 1867, when in the latter part of June he came to America, and for about one year remained in Wisconsin. From thence he went to Minnesota, and for two years attended the Normal School at Winona. He readily acquired a knowledge of the American ways and customs and became a valuable worker. For seven years he was engaged in various occupations, and then entered the postoffice at Minneapolis as clerk, remaining in that position seven years. On leaving Minneapolis he went to Dakota and purchased a half section of land where he now resides. He is the owner of five hundred and sixty acres of land, and has erected a complete set of good farm buildings, and engages extensively in farming, meeting with marked success.

Our subject was married in Minneapolis, Minnesota, February 5, 1870, to Miss Lizzie Bye, the daughter of Taale and Goner Bye, natives of Norway, who died in their own country. Mrs. Slotten was born in Norway, December 5, 1843, and emigrated to America in 1860. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Slotten, as follows: Thorwald Gunda L. Both our subject and wife are active and prominent members of the Norwegian Lutheran church. Mr. Slotten has identified himself with public affairs in whatever locality he has made his residence, and in Minnesota he was chosen sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives in 1878, and served during that session. After taking up his residence in North Dakota he early became well known, and was elected to the state constitutional convention, and the following fall was elected to the state senate, serving in the first legislature after Dakota was admitted into the union. He was later elected one of the railroad commissioners of the state, and in the fall of 1898 he was again elected to the North Dakota state senate, for two years, evidencing his popularity. He is associated with the Republican party politically, and takes a very active interest in the affairs of his party. He is a man of careful, systematic habits and of a conservative turn of mind, and all matters with which he is connected are materially benefited when the management of the same is left to his care. He is intelligent and progressive, and any project that has for its tendency the development of the financial interests of the county or township meets with his sanction and hearty approval. He is a man of the highest integrity of character and has built for himself an enviable reputation as regards business ability and true worth. He is a gentleman of pleasing personality and has many friends wherever he chooses to reside.

HON. RICHARD H. HANKINSON. As an all around prominent man of North Dakota, no one of its citizens more justly deserves the title than Mr. Hankinson. He has been identified with the development and progress of the state, and particularly Richland county, from the early settlement of that region, and is now extensively engaged in farming in Brightwood township, and also conducts a real estate and loan business in the town of Hankinson, making his home on his elegant estate on section twenty-two, but is found at his office in Hankinson daily. He owns about two thousand acres of land, and his home farm is beautifully located on the banks of Lake Elsie, a fine body of water, named for his daughter, Elsie. Every comfort and even the luxuries of life are afforded on his estate, and the buildings thereon are among the finest in the state of North Dakota. On another page is found a portrait of Mr. Hankinson.

Mr. Hankinson was born in Grand Rapids, Michigan, September 7, 1841. He was reared in Grand Rapids, where he lived until the breaking out of the Civil war, when he enlisted, in August, 1861, in Company D, Eighth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and was with them until January 30, 1863, when he was discharged on account of wounds received at the battle of Wilmington Island, Georgia. He returned to Grand Rapids and re-enlisted in the Thirteenth Michigan Light Artillery and served to the close of the war. He participated in the battles at Pocotaligo, Port Royal, Fort Pulaski and Wilmington Island, and later at Antietam, South Mountain, Fredericksburg and minor engagements until the close of the struggle. He received a wound in the left wrist at Wilmington Island, which caused his discharge, and upon his re-enlistment in the Thirteenth Michigan Light Artillery was commissioned first sergeant. He was a loyal and true soldier, and served for the preservation of his country.

After his return from the war our subject went to Minneapolis, Minnesota, where he entered the service of the Northwestern Telegraph Company, and was with them in the capacity of superintendent of construction and assistant general superintendent of the company, until 1881. He organized the Northwestern Telephone Exchange Company in 1878, and was elected general manager of the same, serving until March, 1880. After leaving the service of the Northwestern Telegraph Company in 1881, he settled in Brightwood township, Richland county, North Dakota. He has a fine estate with excellent improvements, and engages extensively in farming. He has divided his time between that line of work and the contracting for construction of telegraph lines, and has built the following lines: From Chicago to Minneapolis; from Louisiana, Missouri, to Kansas City, Missouri; the line for the bankers and merchants from Chicago to Minneapolis. These have been absorbed by the Western Union Telegraph Company. He also built the telegraph line for the Soo railroad and all their branches west of the Red river. He constructed the first telegraph line built in North Dakota, or British North America, in 1871, and personally superintended the construction from Moorhead to Winnipeg, and also from Fargo to Valley Center, and from thence to Bismarck. He has engaged in the real estate business in Minneapolis since locating on his farm and at his office in Hankinson now conducts the real estate and loan business and contracting. He engaged in the mercantile business from 1886 to the fall of 1897.

Our subject was married at Grand Rapids, Michigan, January 20, 1868, to Miss Sarah E. Martin, a native of Michigan. Mrs. Hankinson died in Grand Rapids, Michigan, in March, 1874, leaving one son, Herbert L., who is now in the grain business in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Our subject married Miss Etta M. Wilson, a native of Minnesota, September 27, 1876, at Minneapolis. One daughter has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hankinson, named Elsie E. Mr. Hankinson is a prominent member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Knights of Pythias and the Masonic fraternity, and has passed the Knights Templar degree in the last named order. He was elected to the first state legislature in 1889, and served one term, and was again elected in the fall of 1896. He takes an active part in local affairs, and the town of Hankinson was named for him in appreciation of his services.

HON. WILLIAM T. McCULLOCH, an extensive land owner and successful farmer of Griggs county, is one of the pioneers of that region, and has acquired his possessions by judicious management and industrious habits. He is a man of active public spirit and his labors for the advancement of his county and township have gained him many friends. His present home is on section 14, in township 147, range 60.

Our subject was born in Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, November 1, 1842, and was a son of James and Elizabeth McCulloch. He removed to Blanchard township, in Pearyl county, Canada, with his parents when he was a young child, and there grew to manhood, and made his home with his parents until twenty-four years of age, when he began farming on rented land in Pearyl county, and remained there in that vocation until 1880, when he went to Barnes county, North Dakota, and settled on land northwest of Sanborn, where he lived two years, and then removed to his present land in Griggs county, which he had previously entered claim to. He erected a shanty thereon and has resided on that tract continuously since 1882. He is now the owner of seventeen hundred acres of land in that vicinity, and has met with unbounded success in his calling.

Our subject was married, at the age of twenty-four years, to Miss Sarah A. Sonsborn, a native of Canada, who was born in 1849. Mrs. McCulloch is a daughter of Andrew and Elizabeth Sonsburn, and her father was a farmer by occupation. Mr. and Mrs. McCulloch have been the parents of six children, as follows: James A., Elizabeth J., William A., Graham, Maggie and Norman. The eldest daughter, now Mrs. George Pratt, resides north of Cooperstown, North Dakota. Mr. McCulloch served as a state representative from 1891-95, during which time a special session was called to make an appropriation for the World's Columbian Exposition. He is a man who casts his vote and influence for the principles which he thinks will best benefit his county, and he is a leader among his associates, and as a man of extensive financial affairs he is recognized among the leading men of northern Griggs county.

GENERAL ELLIOTT S. MILLER, the adjutant-general of North Dakota, has attained distinctive preferment in military and political circles, and is one of the representative and prominent citizens of Bismarck. He was born in McLean county, Illinois, November 15, 1846, a son of Sanford C. Miller, a native of Harrisonbury, West Virginia, who removed to Illinois in 1836 and died in that state. The mother died during the infancy of our subject and he never knew her given name.

General Miller was reared and educated in Bloomington, McLean county, Illinois, and when the Civil war broke out he enlisted, in August, 1861, in Company B, Thirty-ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He took an active part in the West Virginia campaign, and in the engagements in the Shenandoah Valley, including the battle of Winchester, in March, 1862. After the battle of Antietam the regiment was transferred to South Carolina and was in the battle of Morris Island. They veteranized January 1, 1864, and were brought back to General Butler's army on the James river. Later they participated in the battles of Petersburg and Richmond and in the famous charge on Fort Gregg, and were in the engagement at Appomattox just before the surrender of General Lee. The government presented the regiment with their eagle in recognition of the gallant charge on Fort Gregg. General Miller was wounded in the head on Morris Island, in 1864, and before Richmond was wounded in the right arm and also in the shoulder and foot, being confined to the hospital for four months. He was mustered out as a sergeant December 16, 1865.

Returning to Illinois, he made his home there until 1879, and the following year came to Jamestown, North Dakota, where he took up a homestead. He did not engage in farming, but followed contracting and building there for several years. In 1885 he was made quartermaster of the First North Dakota State Troops, and in 1891 was commissioned colonel of the regiment. He was appointed adjutant-general by Governor Roger Allen in 1895, and then removed to Bismarck, where he has since resided. He has met with marked success during his residence in this state and has also gained the respect and esteem of all with whom he has come in contact either in public or private life.

He has been a life-long Republican and has taken an active part in the councils of his party. He is a prominent Mason, a Knight Templar and a member of the Mystic Shrine, and is also an honored member of the Grand Army of the Republic, of which he has been inspector general of the department of North Dakota. He has also been a delegate to the national encampment from North Dakota, and was commander of W. H. Seward Post, of Jamestown, for five years.

HON. GEORGE LUTZ, who is conducting an extensive business as a lumber dealer in Jamestown, is one of the leading business men of Stutsman county. He has steadily pushed forward and his present property interests are the direct result of careful management and persistent efforts.

Mr. Lutz was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, December 19, 1852. His father owned and operated a flour and sawmill. Our subject attended the public schools of his native place and at fourteen years of age engaged in the mercantile business, which he followed four years, and then was employed in the bank five years, and spent one year in the German army. For the following four years he was correspondent in Antwerp for a German, French and English importing firm, a position which required a knowledge of the languages of those countries. He came to America in the fall of 1879 and landed at New York, after which he went to Chicago, where he accepted a position in the Chicago office of an exporting firm, with whom he was employed until 1882. In August of that year he went to Jamestown, North Dakota, and was employed by Hartman, Durstine & Company, lumber dealers. There were but few dwellings in the town at that time, and in 1884 he became manager of the James River Lumber Company, and was connected with them until 1893, when he established a lumber yard for himself. He purchased the wood yard of Topliff & Company in 1895, which business he operates in connection with the lumber yard, and enjoys an extensive patronage.

Our subject was married in 1887 to Miss Matilda Bower, who was born and raised at Burlington, Iowa. Mrs. Lutz is a lady of rare attainments, and was a teacher in the public schools of Burlington for five years, and also taught one year in North Dakota. Her father, Philip Bower, was of German descent, and her mother's people also came from Germany before the Civil war. Mr. and Mrs. Lutz have been the parents of two children: Alma, born in 1890, and Paul, born in 1893.

Mr. Lutz was elected as a representative from Stutsman county to the first state legislature of North Dakota, in 1890, and his efficient work and popularity are best evidenced by the fact that he was elected in the same capacity in 1892. He takes an active part in local affairs and for the past ten years has been a member of the board of education, and was president of the board for two years, also a stockholder and director of the James River National Bank, of Jamestown.

JOHN D. FAXON, county auditor of Foster county, is one of the well-known citizens and business men of that region, and his name is connected with the history of Foster county. He is a man of intelligence and enterprise and at all times has shown an active public spirit.

Our subject was born at Fort Ann, Washington county, New York, July 15, 1846. His father, Horace Faxon, was born in America, and was a contractor and builder. The family settled in America in colonial days, two brothers, Thomas and Richard Faxon, coming from England and locating at Braintree, Massachusetts, about 1600, and they and their families took part in the early wars in the United States. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Jane White, was of Irish-Welsh descent, although her parents were also born in New York state.

Mr. Faxon was the second in a family of four children, and was given a common-school education. His father died when our subject was but seven years of age, and at the age of fifteen he began working for others during the summer months and attending school in the winter. He engaged at farming and clerking, and at the age of nineteen years learned the carpenter's trade, after which he went to Buffalo, New York, where he worked in the car shops of the Buffalo & Erie Railway for two years. He then took a position in the car shops at Salem, New York, where he remained ten years, and in 1879 went to Albany and spent one year there, going from thence to Virginia City, Nevada, thinking to benefit his health. He spent some time during the same year at the carpenter's trade in Minnesota, and built the Dalton hotel and other buildings at Dalton, Minnesota. This was then a new town and he remained there four years, working at his trade as much as his health would permit. He went to Cass county, North Dakota, in the fall of 1884 and after spending the winter there took land in Eddy county, North Dakota, on which he erected a house, barn and other farm buildings, and began the cultivation of his land. He put in crops four seasons, and one only was a profitable yield, and in 1887 fire destroyed his house, granary, together with grain, and his household goods, entailing a loss of two thousand dollars. He then moved to New Rockford, and accepted a position with the Duluth & Dakota Elevator Company, and in 1889 gave up his farming interests. He went to St. Paul in the fall of 1889, and in August of the following year went to Carrington, North Dakota, and accepted a position with the North Dakota Elevator Company. He spent six years with them, and in the meantime established the farm implement business. He left the employ of the elevator company in 1896, since which time he has purchased grain for his own business. He has a building 24x60 feet erected near the Northern Pacific tracks, and has been successful in that business. He also owns farm land in Eddy county, North Dakota. He was elected county auditor on the Democratic ticket in the fall of 1898, and has been discharging the duties of that position since March 6, 1899, for the term.

Our subject was married at Salem, New York, to Miss Sarah Snowden, who was born and raised at Albany, New York, and is a daughter of John Snowden. Her father was of English birth, and was a machinist by trade. Mrs. Faxon is a lady of good education, and a graduate of the high school of New York City. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Faxon, as follows: Helen and Marillo. Mr. Faxon has always taken an active interest in public affairs wherever he has chosen his home, and while a resident of New York was collector of taxes in Salem. He was a candidate on the Democratic ticket for representative to the state legislature from the twenty-second district of North Dakota. He is a member of the state central committee of the Democratic party, and has been chairman of the county central committee for a number of years.

HON. GEORGE E. NICHOLS, one of the prominent and representative citizens of Fargo, North Dakota, and president of the Cass County Abstract & Guaranty Company, has shown in his successful career that he has the ability to plan wisely and execute with energy, a combination which, when possessed by men in any walk of life, never fails to effect notable results. He was born in Windham county, Vermont, March 25, 1856, a son of William E. and Jane E. (Prouty) Nichols, natives of Connecticut and Vermont, respectively. They passed their entire lives in New England, the father being employed as a mechanic.

In the schools of his native state our subject acquired his literary education. On leaving home at the age of fifteen years he went to Marshall, Michigan, where he remained for ten years, coming to Fargo in the spring of 1878. Here he was in the employ of N. K. Hubbard, proprietor of the Headquarters Hotel, until 1885, and was then employed as deputy county treasurer under H. H. Burke, in which position he served for six years. In the fall of 1890 he was elected treasurer and filled that office for two terms of two years each. At the end of that time, in 1894, he was elected state treasurer, and was re-elected in 1896, serving in all four years with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. In 1892 he organized the Cass County Abstract & Guaranty Company, of which he has since been president, and was also one of the organizers of the Fargo National Bank, of which he is now a director. He is a business man of more than ordinary ability, is far-sighted and energetic, and the success that he has achieved in life is due entirely to his own well-directed efforts, for he commenced life for himself empty-handed. Socially he is a Knight Templar Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine, and politically he is a pronounced Republican.

In 1882 Mr. Nichols married Miss Elizabeth I. Crane, who was born in Connecticut, and they have become the parents of four children: William C., Arthur A., Tannisse and Imogene.

JUDGE CHARLES A. POLLOCK. North Dakota has already become distinguished for the high rank of her bench and bar. Perhaps none of the newer states can justly boast of abler jurists and attorneys. Prominent among these is Judge Pollock, of Fargo, who now occupies the bench of the third judicial district. He is a native of New York, his birth occurring in Elizabethtown, Essex county, September 27, 1853.

His parents, John and Eunice E. (Ellis) Pollock, were natives of Ireland and New York, respectively. The father, who was a teacher by profession, came to the new world in 1830, at the age of nine years, and was graduated from the Troy Conference Seminary of New York, then presided over by Bishop Jesse T. Peck. He was ordained as a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church, but he devoted the greater part of his time to teaching. He founded the Rainsburg Seminary at Rainsburg, Bedford county, Pennsylvania, where he remained for some years, and in 1856 went to Iowa, and the following year opened the Epworth Seminary at Epworth, Dubuque county, remaining there two years. He then went to DeWitt, Iowa, as principal of the public schools at that place, and later served as county auditor of Clinton county for four years, and as deputy treasurer eight years. In 1895 he came to Fargo, North Dakota, where he died a year later. His wife had passed away in 1895. To them were born four sons; one a resident of Dubuque, Iowa; another of San Francisco, California, while our subject makes his home in Fargo, North Dakota, and the fourth died in infancy. The paternal grandfather, James Pollock, was a farmer by occupation.

Judge Pollock, of this review, was educated by his parents, and at the age of fourteen commenced work as deputy in the office of the register of deeds in Clinton county, Iowa, where he remained six years. He then entered Cornell College at Mt. Vernon, Iowa, from which he was graduated in 1878, and the following two years was principal of the public schools of Lowden, Iowa, during which time he also studied law. He graduated from the law department of the State University of Iowa, in 1881, and on the 15th of July, that year, opened a law office in Fargo, North Dakota, where he has since engaged in practice, meeting with marked success in his chosen calling. He has recently been chosen to lecture in the law department of the State University of North Dakota and has accepted.

In 1882 Judge Polk married Miss Martha Clinton, daughter of Rev. John W. Clinton, a native of Ontario, Canada, and by this union four children were born, namely: John C., who died at the age of three years and a half; Clara A.; Martha L. and Dewitt C. The family belong to the Methodist Episcopal church, and the Judge is a member of the Masonic order and the Bar Association. Politically he is an ardent Republican and as an orator has taken an active part in campaign work throughout the state. In 1885 he was elected district attorney and creditably filled that office for two terms. He was elected judge of the third judicial district in 1896, in which position he is now serving with distinction. He is absolutely fearless in the discharge of his duties, favor cannot tempt him from the straight path, and he has been successful in enforcing the prohibition law and in reducing the number of divorces granted by the court. His sentences are models of judicial fairness, and he is a type of the law that respects and protects, not condemns humanity.

GENERAL ALEXANDER HUGHES, of whom a portrait will be found on another page, is one of the ablest lawyers practicing in the state, is a recognized leader in the Republican party, and is an honored veteran of the Civil war. A native of Canada, he was born in Bradford, September 30, 1846, and is a son of Christopher and Frances (Pike) Hughes, who were born in the north of Ireland and emigrated to Canada about 1801 or 1802. In 1846 they removed to Columbia county, Wisconsin, where the father entered a government tract of land. He was a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland, and was a civil engineer, which profession he followed to some extent throughout his entire life. He died in Wisconsin in 1867, and his wife in 1871. To them were born thirteen children, six sons and seven daughters, of whom only our subject and four sisters are now living. Two of the sons died from wounds received in the Civil war.

General Hughes was reared and educated in Wisconsin, attending first the common schools of that state, which at that time were much inferior to those of the present day. Feeling his country needed his services during the dark days of the Rebellion, he enlisted in Company B, Seventh Wisconsin Infantry, which was assigned to the First Division, First Corps, Army of the Potomac. With this command he participated in the battles of Gainesville, the second Bull Run, the first and second battles of Fredericksburg, and the engagements at Chancellorsville and Brady Station. He was slightly wounded at Gainesville; was shot through the right arm at South Mountain, and in the last day of the battle of Gettysburg was wounded in the left side. Subsequently he took part in the seven days' battle of the Wilderness, where he was wounded in the right leg, and received a heavy blow from a musket at Spottsylvania Court House, but did not go to the hospital. During the battle of North Anne river he was seriously wounded, a shot entering his left side and coming out on the right. He lay in a helpless condition for nearly two years.

On leaving the service, General Hughes realized the necessity for a good education, and entered Wayland Academy, Beaver Dam, Wisconsin, and later took a course at Bryant & Stratton's Business College, Milwaukee. He was married in 1860 to Miss Mary E. Higinbotham, a native of Indiana, and a granddaughter of Judge Eckles, of Indiana, who was later chief justice of Utah territory. Her father, Samuel Higinbotham, was a surgeon in the Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteer Infantry during the Civil war, and died in the service in Tennessee. To our subject and his wife were born five sons and one daughter, namely: George A. and Edmund A., both residents of Fargo, North Dakota; Harry A., who died in 1883; William V., Frank C. and Helen A., all at home.

General Hughes located at Monticello, Iowa, in 1868, and commenced the practice of law. The following year he was elected superintendent of schools for the county of Jones. In April, 1871, he removed, with his family, to Elk Point, in the territory of Dakota, now the state of South Dakota, and soon gained high rank in his profession. In 1872 he was elected a member of the upper house of the territorial legislature, and upon its organization was elected presiding officer of said body. In 1880 he was appointed, by the President, superintendent of the census for the territory of Dakota. In 1881 he was appointed receiver for the United States land office at Yankton, which office he resigned in 1883 to accept the office of attorney-general. In the year 1883 he was appointed, by the legislative assembly, a member of the committee to select the site for the seat of government and to erect a capitol building upon such site. When the commission was organized he was elected as president. The capitol building at Bismarck was constructed under his immediate direction and supervision. He removed to Bismarck in 1883 with the other territorial officers and continued to reside at said place until 1890, when he removed to Fargo. He represented the Bismarck district in the higher branch of the legislative assembly for two terms, and was chairman of the committee on judiciary. Many of the most important laws enacted during the past thirty years in the territory of Dakota and in the state of North Dakota were prepared by him. For sixteen years he filled the position of assistant counsel of the Northern Pacific Railway Company to the entire satisfaction of the company. He was also the first adjutant-general of the territory of Dakota. During the last few years he has given considerable time to business affairs, and is president of the Fargo-Edison Company and of the Hughes Electric Company, whose plants at Fargo, Bismarck and Dickinson furnish light, power and heat for those cities.

The General is now one of the most active and best-known Republicans in the northwest. He has been a member of the territorial and state central and executive committees almost continuously for the past twenty-seven years. He was a delegate to the national Republican conventions in 1872, 1876, 1880 and in 1896. He is recognized as an able lawyer, a graceful, logical and forcible speaker, and is considered especially able in the discussion of legal questions before the courts.

COLONEL GEORGE M. YOUNG, of Valley City, North Dakota, is one of the younger members of the Barnes county bar, but his prominence is by no means measured by his years; on the contrary, he has won a reputation which many an older practitioner might well envy. He was born at Lakelet, Ontario, Canada, December 11, 1870, and is a son of Richard and Jane (Eaton) Young, also natives of that country. The father was born in Leeds county, Ontario, in 1822, and during his active business life was engaged in the lumber trade, in which he was successful. For a time he served as first lieutenant in the Tenth Regiment Volunteers of Canada. He died in 1885, and his estimable wife, who was born in 1832, passed away in 1896. The paternal grandfather of our subject served with distinction as colonel of a volunteer regiment in Canada. He was born in Ireland in 1798, and died in Lakelet, Ontario, at the advanced age of ninety-three years.

George M. Young began his literary education in the public schools of his native land and later attended the high school at Orangeville. On coming to the United States in 1888, he first located at Minneapolis, Minnesota, where he engaged in newspaper work. In the summer of 1890 he commenced the study of law in the law office of Pollock & Young, of Casselton, North Dakota. Later he attended the College of Law of the University of Minnesota, from which college he graduated. In 1893 he returned to North Dakota, where for a year he was in the law office of Hon. O. W. Francis, at Fargo. In November, 1894, he took up his residence in Valley City, where he opened an office and engaged in practice alone until May, 1899, when he formed a partnership with Lee Combs, under the firm name of Young & Combs. They do a general law business, but make a practice of practicing in the state and federal courts, doing more than any other firm in that line in Barnes county. Mr. Young is very popular and influential, and is now a member of the governor's staff.

In January, 1899, at the home of the bride, in St. Charles, Michigan, was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Young and Miss Augusta L. Freeman, a daughter of Jared and Caroline M. (Adams) Freeman. The father is a prominent lumber merchant of that place, and the mother is a direct descendant of President John Adams.

SERENO N. PUTNAM, register of deeds of Eddy county, is one of the early settlers of that region, and has been identified with the development and advancement of Eddy county. He is a gentleman of broad mind and well educated, and is entitled to a foremost place among the promoters of business matters. He has varied financial interests in agricultural lines, and is one of the substantial men of his community.

Our subject was born in Sherburne county, Minnesota, in March, 1861. His father, Henry T. Putnam, was a farmer and merchant in Minnesota. Our subject is a descendant of a brother of Israel Putnam, of Revolutionary fame. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Caroline Newton, was of English descent, and the family settled in America in colonial times.

Our subject was the second in a family of five children, and was raised on a farm in his native state. He attended the country schools and also the Normal School at St. Cloud, Minnesota, and graduated from that institution in 1880. He began teaching school at the age of sixteen years, and followed that vocation most of the time for about five years, and in 1883 came to Eddy county, North Dakota. He entered claim to government land near Tiffany and began farming. He erected a 6x8 feet shanty and lived alone and followed farming with oxen. He continued farming until 1886, when he was elected county superintendent of schools, and was re-elected at the expiration of his term. He had his office on his farm, and served in that capacity two terms. He attended the department of law at the State University of Minnesota during the winter of 1890-91, after which he followed teaching a short time, and in the fall of 1894 was elected county register of deeds of Eddy county. He was re-elected in 1896, and again in 1898, and is now serving his third term in that position. He is an efficient officer, and enjoys popularity.

Our subject was married in 1888 to Miss Grace Brown, a native of New York. Mrs. Putnam is a lady of good education, and is a graduate of the Mayville Normal School of North Dakota. She taught school in North Dakota several terms, and her father was one of the early settlers of that state and was a farmer by occupation. Mr. Putnam is a member of the Knights of Pythias lodge and of the Masonic fraternity. He is a man who keeps abreast of the times on all important issues, and takes an active interest in the welfare of his community, and is deservedly held in high esteem by his fellowmen. In political faith he is a Republican, and stands firmly for the principles of his party.

FRANKLIN S. DUNHAM. One of the extensive farms of township 149, range 67, in Eddy county, is owned and ably operated by the subject of this review. Mr. Dunham is one of the pioneer settlers of North Dakota, and has been identified with the farming interests of Eddy county since taking up his residence there, and is now the fortunate possessor of sixteen hundred acres of land, and is successfully conducting diversified farming thereon. He is a man of honest purpose and true citizenship, and is highly esteemed throughout that locality where he is well known and has been associated with the people in various important public offices.

Our subject was born in Wyoming county, New York, March 23, 1854. The Dunham family came to America from England about 1808, and the mother's family was also of English descent. The father of our subject, George H. Dunham, was a farmer by occupation and also superintendent of schools of Wyoming county, New York for six years, and during the last twenty years of his life he was engaged in the insurance business, and has made his home at Johnsonsburgh, New York. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of Louise Virgin, and was born and raised in eastern New York state. Our subject's brother, Fred Dunham, is an attorney at law in Batavia, New York.

Franklin S. Dunham was the second in a family of three children, and was reared on a farm and given a common-school education, and later attended an academy. After attaining his majority he rented a farm in western New York state and followed farming thereon eight years, and in 1883 went to North Dakota and entered claim to government land in Eddy county, upon which he erected a claim shanty 16x16 feet. He had a limited start, and had only sod barns, and for the first two years farmed with oxen. His crops were fair but cut too soon, and his wheat shrunk and was almost worthless, but his crop of oats was good. He was elected county treasurer on the Republican ticket in 1892, and the following year removed to New Rockford, and was re-elected in 1894, and in 1896 was elected county auditor, making his public service as a county officer extend over a period of six years. He also conducted his farm while in the city, and in the spring of 1899 returned to the same to reside. He has about one thousand acres of his land under cultivation and has all necessary machinery, and a complete set of good farm buildings, and six acres of cottonwood trees, plenty of good water, and a finely developed farm in every particular, and is known as one of the substantial farmers of the community.

Our subject was married in 1876, to Miss Clara North, who was born and raised in Genesee county, New York. Mrs. Dunham is of English descent, and her father, Noah North, was a farmer by occupation. Mrs. Dunham is a lady of excellent education, and was a teacher in her native state at the time of her marriage. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dunham, as follows: George H., Fred Harrison, and Clara Louise, all of whom were born in Dakota. Mr. Dunham is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Modern Woodmen of America. Politically he is a Republican, and is a man who stands firm for his convictions.

DR. HENRY M. WHEELER, one of the best known physicians and surgeons of the Northwest, enjoys an extensive general practice in Grand Forks, North Dakota. He was born in Sullivan county, New Hampshire, June 23, 1853.

The parents of our subject, Mason and HulDAH (Wheeler) Wheeler, were natives of Vermont and New Hampshire, respectively, and the father was a drover and stock raiser, and went to Northfield, Minnesota, in 1856, and spent his remaining years there. Two sons composed the family of children born to this worthy couple, the brother of our subject now residing in New York.

Mr. Wheeler was reared and educated in Minnesota, and attended Carlton College of Northfield, and then began the study of medicine under Dr. C. M. Thompson. He entered the University of Michigan in 1875, and graduated in 1877, and during the same year began the practice of his profession at Northfield, Minnesota, and in 1879 entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York City, and graduated from there in 1881. He then located in Grand Forks, North Dakota, and has continued his practice there since that date. He is secretary of the state examining board, serving since 1894, and is local surgeon for the Northern Pacific and Great Northern railroads, which position he has held for many years. He has also served on the United States pension examining board, and is a member of the State Medical Society of Minnesota, and was president of the North Dakota State Medical Society.

Our subject was married in October, 1878, to Miss Adaline Murry, a native of Minnesota. Mrs. Wheeler died in 1881. Mr. Wheeler was married to Miss Josephine E. Connell, a native of Minnesota, in 1883. Our subject is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Knights of Pythias, and was grand master of the Masonic order in North Dakota in 1888. He is a Republican politically and is firm in his convictions, but takes little part in political affairs, and has never sought public preferment. Mr. Wheeler has a handsome gold watch which was presented to him by the First National Bank of Northfield, Minnesota, in remembrance of his services in assisting in repelling the attack on that bank in 1876 by the James and Younger brothers. A history of that famous raid was written by Professor Huntington, and he tells of the bravery and quick action of Dr. Wheeler at the time. He was visiting his home during a vacation at college in Michigan, and was one of the first to suspect an attempt was being made to rob the bank. Mr. Allen was the first to give the alarm, and at the same moment Mr. Wheeler stepped into the street from in front of his father's store where he had been sitting, and he shouted "robbery," and then turned to get his gun, but remembered he had left it at home, and then went to the Donprier hotel, where an old army carbine with three cartridges were secured, and he was soon at a second-story window. His first shot was at Jim Younger, but the gun carried high, and Younger looked for the gunner and rode on, and Mr. Wheeler then shot at Clel Miller, the bullet passing through the body, severing the great artery and death ensued instantly. The third and last cartridge had fallen to the floor and had burst the paper and a fresh supply was then brought him by a friend and immediately followed several shots at Bob Younger by Mr. Manning, and the former dodged behind a stairway and returned the fire, and this was repeated several times, when Mr. Wheeler shot at Younger and the ball struck the robber's elbow, shattering the bone. Younger coolly changed his pistol to his left hand and continued to shoot at Manning, and while Manning was endeavoring to get to the back of the store and Wheeler was re-loading his gun, Younger made his escape, and mounted a horse behind his brother, Cole. The outlaws were pursued and captured, and sentenced to life imprisonment at Stillwater, Minnesota, and the watch presented to Mr. Wheeler in appreciation of his services is shown with due pride, but the affair is seldom mentioned by Mr. Wheeler unless he is urged to do so by his many friends.

JAMES L. LEE, LL. D. The professions are well represented in Wells county, and a prominent place among this number is held by the gentleman above named. He is a practicing attorney of Fessenden, and has attained his high position as an attorney and citizen by faithful service and earnest study, and is a gentleman of excellent education and refinement.

Our subject was born in Toledo, Ohio, in August, 1856. His foster father, Hiram Lee, was a farmer by occupation in Ohio, and was a native of Pennsylvania, and died in Kansas in 1807. The great-grandfather of our subject was born in New England, and the mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Porter, was born in France and emigrated to America. Our subject was reared by foster parents, of the name of Lee, who were New York people. He was reared in Illinois on a farm and assisted with the work of the place and did not attend school regularly until nineteen years of age, when he attended the country school winters and later attended an academy. Between 1873-76 he attended the law school at Ann Arbor, Michigan, and graduated in 1887 with the degree of LL. D. He established himself in the practice of his profession in Clear Lake, Iowa, in the spring of 1878 and continued there twelve years, during which time he built up an extensive general practice, and in 1889 went to Topeka, Kansas, where he practiced two years, and then spent some months traveling through the western states to the Pacific coast. He assumed charge of the collection department of the machine firm of D. M. Osborne & Company, of Chicago, and was thus engaged five years. He located in Fessenden, North Dakota, August 15, 1896, where he established his office and has since followed his practice.

Our subject was married in Fessenden, North Dakota, March 21, 1897, to Miss Hattie Jones. Mrs. Lee was born in Vexio, Sweden, and came to America in 1886, at the age of fourteen years. Her father, who was of English descent, died when she was five years of age. Mr. Lee is the father of the following children by a former marriage: Fred L., owner and operator of a silver mine in Idaho, residing at Wallace; Stella; and James N., attending Central High School at Minneapolis. Mr. Lee is active in public affairs and is a Republican in politics.

HON. MARTIN HECTOR, one of Fargo's most popular and influential business men, is now president of the Fargo National Bank, which, while not one of the oldest banking houses of the state, is considered one of its most substantial. It was organized in 1897, and its deposits have rapidly increased until today they average with any bank in the state. On its organization Mr. Hector was chosen president, O. J. DeLendrecies, vice-president and W. C. McFadden, cashier. Its board of directors is composed of the above named gentleman, together with Seth Wright and George E. Nichols. All are well-known citizens of North Dakota and are numbered among Fargo's most prosperous and reliable business men. They do a general banking business and issue foreign and domestic exchange.

Mr. Hector, the able president of this financial institution, has been a resident of Fargo since 1872. He came to the Northwest a poor boy without other resources than good health and a determination to succeed, and has worked his way upward in the commercial world until today he stands in the front rank of the successful business men of this section, having become one of the wealthiest men of North Dakota. He is also prominent in public affairs and has filled a number of positions of honor and trust since coming to this state. He was president of the city council for several years, and has done much to bring about the substantial improvements in which Fargo takes a great pride. He has never sought political preferment or public honors, but holds a high position in social and business circles. In 1893 he was selected as a member of the board of commissioners from North Dakota to the World's Fair, and was elected president of that body. While devoting a great deal of time and money to that work (probably equivalent to $1,000), he refused to accept from the state any pay for his services. He is always willing to support any movement calculated to prove of public benefit and the community is fortunate that number him among its citizens.

JOHN P. REEDER. There are few men in Wahpeton, Richland county, North Dakota, in the past ten years who have done more for its commercial interests and its growth and development than the man whose name heads this review. He is a prominent figure in business, political and social circles, is at present serving as mayor of the city, and is one of its leading merchants.

Mr. Reeder was born in Lake county, Indiana, November 11, 1863, and there he continued to make his home until about eighteen years of age, being indebted to its schools for his educational privileges. In 1881 he removed to Minnesota, and after two years spent in that state he came to Wahpeton, where he was employed as clerk in a general store for about two years. He then embarked in business on his own account as a merchant, and today carries a large and well assorted stock of general merchandise, for which he finds a ready sale, having built up an excellent trade in the city and surrounding country.

In Lake county, Indiana, Mr. Reeder was married, in 1886, to Miss Josephine Schreiber, a native of that county, and they now have a family of four children: John, George, Gilbert and Herman. Socially Mr. Reeder is a prominent member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Foresters. He is one of the most influential and public-spirited citizens of Wahpeton and has made a most efficient and popular officer, doing all in his power to advance the interests of the city. He has served as mayor continuously since 1896, and prior to that time was one of the county commissioners of Richland county for years. He was also a member of the school board one year, and in 1894 was a candidate for the legislature on the Democratic ticket, and came within seven votes of being elected. In 1895 he erected the Wahpeton opera house which he still owns and conducts, and has been identified with a number of enterprises which have proved of public benefit.

JUDGE WASHINGTON I. WARREY. This gentleman is widely known as an intelligent and worthy citizen of Sherbrooke, Steele county, and his labors as county judge of Steele county are beyond criticism. He is outspoken and generous and is always found standing on the side of right and justice, and working for the interests of his fellow-men.

Mr. Warrey was born in Rensselaer county, New York, August 23, 1855, and he and his younger sister were the only children born to Robert and Hannah (Carver) Warrey. The father had been married previous to his union with our subject's mother, and was the father of three children by his first marriage; and the mother of our subject, by a previous marriage to a Mr. Simmons, was the mother of three children, the family thus consisting of eight children. When our subject was a child the family removed to Binghamton, New York, where the father worked at contracting and building. He was an architect and designer, and also worked at practical carpenter work, and during the Civil war was in charge of the force of pontoon and bridge builders. He died when our subject was nine years of age, and the lad soon went to live with a farmer for two years, and in 1867, after the death of his mother, he took up his residence with an uncle, who was appointed his guardian. When seventeen years of age he became apprenticed to the mason's trade, but he was possessed of a desire for a more liberal education, and when nineteen years of age he accordingly entered Delaware Literary Institute, at Franklin, New York, where he remained four years. He worked his way through this institution, but his studies were continually interrupted by several terms of school which he taught in the village and country. He descended from a family of educators. A number of his mother's near relatives were prominent among the leading professors in Amherst College and other universities of the east. His ambition, however, was to perfect himself for the practice of law. He went to Wyandotte, Kansas, in 1880, and worked at carpenter work and later joined the police force, studying law in the meantime, but this double duty was undermining his health and he again began the carpenter work and became foreman of a crew for the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis Railroad Company, building station and section houses. He did not gain in health, and in August, 1884, went to Fargo, North Dakota, and worked at carpenter work there for a short time and then located in Steele county, North Dakota. He taught school several winters in Steele and Cass counties, and in the spring of 1885 filed a claim to land in Broadlawn township, and until 1893 he was engaged in contract work with headquarters at Hope. He purchased a building at Sherbrooke in June, 1893, and began hotel keeping, and also established a livery barn, and in 1897 also engaged in the general merchandise business, in which work he is now engaged, and is a successful business man.

Our subject was married, in 1888, to Miss Rose L. Wallace, a resident of Page, Cass county, North Dakota. Four children have been born to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Warrey, as follows: Victor L., Edward R., Lillian E. and Washington I. The public record of Mr. Warrey is worthy of note. He was elected county surveyor in 1890, and while serving thus was also deputy sheriff of Steele county, and in 1894 was elected county judge, and is now serving his third term, and since taking up his residence in Sherbrooke has twice served as deputy sheriff. He is prominent in secret society circles and holds membership in the following orders: Masonic, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Modern Woodmen of America. In political sentiment he is a Republican, and is a man of deep thought and deservedly popular with the people. A portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Warrey appears on another page.

HERBERT ROOT, deceased, was for almost twenty years prominently identified with the interests of Valley City, Barnes county, North Dakota, as one of its leading attorneys and business men. He early learned that knowledge is the key with which the poor boy could open the store house of the world and cull its choicest fruits. The result is he became one of the most successful men of his city, and essentially the architect of his own fortune.

Mr. Root was born on a farm in county Holdimond, Ontario, Canada, August 12, 1848, a son of Isaac and Sarah (Dobie) Root, also natives of Canada. He was a direct descendant of Henry Rott, of Pennsylvania, the name having been changed in his father's time. Isaac Root was born in Lincoln county, Ontario, in 1808, followed the occupation of a farmer throughout life, and died in 1891. The mother of our subject, who was born in 1811, departed this life in 1858, and two years later the father married Calista Barrett, who still survives him and resides in Canada.

The early education of Herbert Root was acquired in the district schools of his native province. Coming to the United States at the age of twelve years, he located at Quincy, Illinois, and accepted a position as clerk with his uncle, Henry Root, then conducting one of the largest dry goods stores in that city. Our subject remained in his employ until 1869, when he entered the Methodist Episcopal College at Quincy, where he pursued a general course of study for one year. The following year he engaged in teaching a country school near Racine, Wisconsin, and in 1870 became a student at Racine College, where he took the classical course and graduated with high honors in 1872, standing at the head of his class and receiving the degrees of A. B. and A. M. He also won five gold medals at that school. It was by his own unaided efforts that he secured his collegiate education. He was next a student at the Nashotah Theological Seminary of Waukesha county, Wisconsin, and from that institution he was graduated in August, 1874.

Mr. Root was then ordained a deacon in the Episcopal church of St. Peter and St. Paul, Washington boulevard and Peoria street, Chicago, and as such was in charge of Grace church at Sterling, Illinois, for a time. He was next sent to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where he was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Wells, and subsequently became assistant to Dr. John Fulton, dean of the Cathedral at Indianapolis, Indiana, where he remained a year. He was then rector at Grace church, Muncie, Indiana, until March, 1877, when he came west and for three years was rector of St. Paul's church at Brainard, Minnesota.

In March, 1880, Mr. Root became a resident of Valley City, North Dakota. His first venture here was in the private banking business, but in 1881 he assisted in organizing the First National Bank, of which he was cashier until January, 1882, when he resigned and organized the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank. He was president of that corporation until it went into voluntary liquidation in 1890, paying one hundred cents on the dollar. He then successfully engaged in farming and the practice of law, and while he maintained an office in the city, his home was in the country north of the place. He was prominent in business circles and occupied an enviable position in the esteem of his fellow citizens.

On the 13th of March, 1875, Mr. Root was united in marriage with Miss Harriet C. Warner, of Racine, Wisconsin, daughter of Eli W. and Hannah Warner. Her parents were from Hartford, Connecticut, and were among the early settlers of Racine county, Wisconsin.

Mr. Root died January 5, 1900, at St. Luke's hospital, St. Paul, Minnesota, whither he had gone, accompanied by his wife, for medical advice. His death was due to disease of the heart, and was a terrible shock to a large circle of friends. His best obituary is found in the general epistle of St. James, first chapter, twenty-seventh verse. His mortal part lies in Mound cemetery, Racine, Wisconsin.

He attended the common schools, and resided there until the spring of 1880, when he went to Dakota, and settled in Richland county. He resided there five years, and then moved his family to their present home in Sargent county, having taken the land as a homestead in 1883. He has added valuable improvements to the place, and is now the owner of four hundred and eighty acres of land, and engages in general farming, meeting with success.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are the parents of four children, as follows: Edward, Emma J., Albert, and Palmer. Mr. Johnson is active in all local affairs, and has served as county commissioner for Sargent county for several terms, and is the present chairman of the board, and has been township assessor of Shuman township for several successive years, and also a member of the school board for several years. He is one who justly deserves his prominent place among the people of Sargent county.

JOHN F. PHILBRICK, assistant attorney-general of North Dakota, and one of the most prominent and successful lawyers of Bismarck, was born in Pittsfield, New Hampshire, June 9, 1855, a son of Richard N. and Olive J. (Green) Philbrick, also natives of that state. The father is a harnessmaker and is now a resident of Concord, New Hampshire.

Our subject was reared in his native state and acquired his early education in its public schools. Later he spent one year at Collinsville, Illinois, and in 1877 entered Dartmouth College, from which he was graduated in 1881. The following year he commenced the study of law in the office of ex-Governor John P. Altgeld, in Chicago, Illinois, and remained there some months. In December, 1882, came to Bismarck, North Dakota, where he continued preparing for his chosen profession, and in 1885 was admitted to the bar. He has since successfully engaged in practice in Bismarck, and is now a member of the well-known firm of Boucher, Philbrick & Cochrane.

In 1889 he was elected judge of probate and filled that office for two years, and in 1895 was made assistant attorney-general, in which capacity he is still serving with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. He came to America in 1867 and settled in Columbia county, Wisconsin, where he followed farming work four years and then removed to Dakota in 1871. He

Mr. Hanson was elected county commissioner in 1898, and he served as a member of the general assembly in the session of 1890-91. He is one of the leading men of the county, and every enterprise which tends to upbuild his community is heartily supported by him, and as a man of exemplary character he stands high in the minds of his associates. He has gained his possessions single-handed and is enjoying the result of a well-spent career. He holds membership in the Norwegian Lutheran church.

OLE H. EVENSON, deceased. Credit is indeed due the man who leaves his native land and seeks his fortune in a new country, with the good results which was the lot of this gentleman. He made a success of the pursuit of agriculture, and that in a country where white men had never before made residence. He passed through all the struggles of the pioneer and became one of the prosperous agriculturists of Mooreton township, Richland county. He made his home on section 10, and was surrounded by all of the adjuncts of a model rural home.

Mr. Evenson was born in Norway, January 6, 1853. Upon attaining his majority, in 1874, he decided to turn his way toward the new world, and accordingly emigrated to America, landing in New York in the early part of the summer of that year. He went to Richland county, North Dakota, in March, 1878, and took a quit claim on one hundred and sixty acres of land in what is now Mooreton township, formerly known as Center township. In the fall of that year he settled on his claim and has held continuous residence there. At the time of his death he was the possessor of four hundred acres of fertile land, with improvements that make it a comfortable and valuable estate.

Mr. Evenson was married in Northfield, Minnesota, September 10, 1877, to Miss Mary Thompson, who was also a native of Norway. Mrs. Evenson was born October 22, 1852, and emigrated to America about 1870. Ten children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Evenson, as follows: Clara, Helmer, Tillie, Ed-

NEWTON A. LEWIS, the well-known president of the Merchants' State Bank and a prominent business man of Fargo, North Dakota, is a native of Vermont, born in Orleans county, April 4, 1855, and is a son of Harvey and Emily D. (Tomlinson) Lewis, farming people, who spent their entire lives in the Green Mountain state. In their family were four sons, three of whom are now living, but our subject is the only one who makes his home in the West. He was reared and principally educated in his native state, but also took a course of study at Gaskill Business College, Manchester, New Hampshire.

Mr. Lewis began his business career as a clerk, and followed that occupation in the East for three years, after which he was engaged in business there for himself one year. It was in 1882 that he came to Fargo, North Dakota, and here he clerked in a grocery store for a time. Two years were spent as mailing clerk in the postoffice, and he then embarked in the grocery business as a member of the firm of Vidger & Lewis. They soon became interested in a wholesale produce and commission business, which they successfully carried on together until January, 1898, when Mr. Lewis retired from the firm, but Mr. Vidger still continues the business. Mr. Lewis has been a director of the Merchants' State Bank since its organization, August 18, 1890. It began business with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars, which has since been increased to one hundred thousand dollars, and its first officers were Hon. E. F. Spalding, president; Thomas Baker, Jr., vice-president; and L. S. Champirie, cashier. Mr. Spalding continued as president for about four years and was succeeded by Col. J. D. Benton, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere in this volume. Mr. Lewis was chosen as vice-president and also served as cashier and general manager. In 1896 H. W. Gearey was elected cashier, in which capacity he had served for some months previous, and is still filling that position. When Colonel Benton retired in 1898, Mr. Lewis was chosen president in his stead and Oscar G. Barnes, vice-president. The board of directors are all residents of Fargo and leading business men of the place. They do a general banking business and their annual deposits amount to about four hundred thousand dollars. The bank is one of the most solid financial institutions of the state, and its officers are straightforward and successful business men of known reliability. Mr. Lewis is also a stockholder of the Fargo Packing & Cold Storage Company, and is interested in other business enterprises. Since coming to this state he has met with most excellent success in his undertakings and has become the possessor of a handsome competence secured through his own well-directed efforts. Besides the property already mentioned, he is also the owner of some real estate.

In 1878 Mr. Lewis was married in Vermont to Miss Cora E. Baker, a native of that state. Socially he belongs to the Knights of Pythias, and politically is identified with the Republican party. He has been treasurer of the Agricultural College for four years, and today he is one of the best known men in North Dakota, especially in business circles. His life affords an example to the young, in that he commenced life here without money or friends, but having a determination to succeed he industriously applied himself until he has acquired a handsome property.

OSCAR J. SEILER, attorney at law at Jamestown, is one of the rising young men of Stutsman county, North Dakota. Aside from the practice of his profession he conducts an extensive real estate, insurance and collection business and enjoys the confidence of those among whom he resides.

Mr. Seiler was born near Stephenville, Outagamie county, Wisconsin, March 20, 1870, and is a son of John and Amanda (Mason) Seiler. His father was born in Germany and came to America at the age of twenty years and followed farming. Our subject's mother was born in Indiana and was of American parentage.

In a family of thirteen children, eight of whom are now living, our subject was the seventh in order of birth. He was raised on a farm and attended the country and village schools, and at the age of sixteen years began to earn his livelihood. He went to Stutsman county, North Dakota, and worked at farm labor the first summer near Montpelier for one hundred dollars and the following year he spent on farms in the same vicinity, and in the fall of 1887 went to Jamestown and attended school, and the following spring entered the law office of L. T. Hamilton as clerk, and the following winter again attended school. He then continued in the law office five years, and in 1893 went to Grand Forks, North Dakota, where he spent one year in the life insurance business with Joe Mills, and in the fall of 1893 he purchased the collection business of Mr. Hamilton and entered into partnership with E. W. Camp. He continued with Mr. Camp six years, and March 27, 1899, was admitted to practice in the supreme court. He then dissolved partnership with Mr. Camp, since which time he has conducted the business alone, and his practice and financial interests have steadily increased. He is the owner of considerable property in Stutsman county, about two and a half sections of farming lands, mostly grain farms, and also has a residence property in Jamestown.

Our subject was married, in 1893, to Miss Rachel Biglow, who was born and raised in Iowa. Mrs. Seiler is a lady of good education, a high school graduate, and for some time a teacher in North Dakota. Her father was one of the early settlers of that state. Mr. and Mrs. Seiler are the parents of two children: Linn, who was born in 1895, and Eugene, who was born in 1899. Mr. Seiler is treasurer of the North Dakota Hospital for the Insane, and handles vast sums of money in this connection. He is an efficient officer, and highly esteemed as a citizen. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Politically he is a Republican.

JUDGE GUY C. H. CORLISS, one of the most learned members of the legal profession in North Dakota, has gained his knowledge and high station by dint of his own efforts. He has studied always with the idea of strengthening his mind and character, and he now stands at the head of the North Dakota bar. Mr. Corliss has resided in Grand Forks since the fall of 1886, and counts every man as his friend who has ever known him. A portrait of Judge Corliss appears on another page of this volume.

Our subject was born at Poughkeepsie, New York, July 4, 1858. His father, Cyrus K. Corliss, was a lawyer, and was born at Ballston Springs, New York, and moved to Poughkeepsie about 1840.

Mr. Corliss was graduated from the Poughkeepsie high school at the age of fourteen years, and has attended no schools since that time. He then became clerk in a store, and began the study of law in June, 1876, in the office of J. S. Van Cleef, and was admitted to the bar in September, 1879, at Brooklyn, New York. He practiced his profession at his old home until the fall of 1886, when he removed to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and entered into partnership with J. H. Bosard, of that city, which partnership continued until the fall of 1889, when our subject was elected judge of the supreme court and became first chief justice. He served on the bench until August 15, 1898, when he resigned. He was re-nominated for the supreme bench by all of the political parties in 1892, and had no opposition to his candidacy.

Mr. Corliss was married April 6, 1883, Miss Effie V. Edson, of Clifton Springs, New York, becoming his wife. Four children, three sons and one daughter, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Corliss. Judge Corliss was made dean of the law school of the University of North Dakota in the summer of 1889. As a practitioner he is well read, and as a judge he has no superiors in the state. He has a quick and comprehensive mind, is earnest in convictions and able in his assertions, and devotes himself to the interests entrusted to his care, and too much cannot be said of him as a practitioner and citizen.

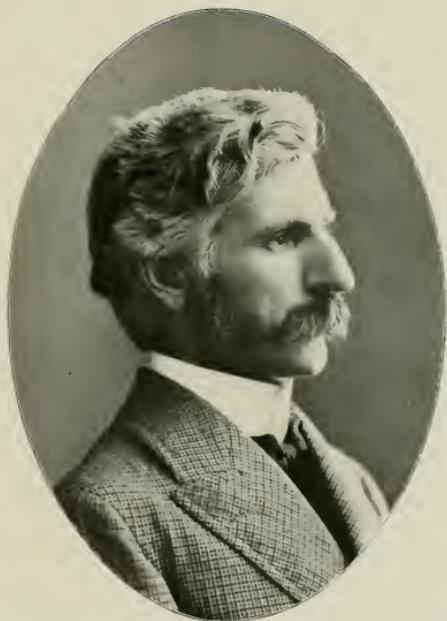

THOMAS M. HANCOCK, of the firm of Shields & Hancock, publishers of the "Edgeley Mail," is a gentleman of much force of character, and occupies a prominent position as a citizen of true worth.

Our subject was born in London, England, April 15, 1870, and was the eldest in a family of ten children, six sons and four daughters, born to Luke and Louisa (Mitchell) Hancock. His parents were married in their native country, England, and the father was a machinist by trade. Our subject received his early education in his native land, and came to America with his parents when a young boy, and located in Canada. Some time later they went to the state of New York, and there our subject worked at rail-roading, and in 1889 went to Fargo, North Dakota. He secured a position on the "Fargo Commonwealth," which paper has since been discontinued. He there received his first lessons in printing, and remained in their employ until the fall of 1891 when he went to Edgeley and assumed charge of the "Mail" publishing office, the following year becoming a partner with Mr. Shields. He is the present editor of the paper, and supervises the news columns. He was appointed postmaster at Edgeley during Cleveland's administration, and was an efficient officer.

Our subject was married in Salem, South Dakota, October 6, 1894, to Miss Hattie French, a native of Missouri. Mrs. Hancock's father, L. W. French, was an extensive farmer in Missouri, and is now a resident of Edgeley, North Dakota. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hancock, a daughter, who bears the name of Gertrude M. Mr. Hancock is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Modern Woodmen of America, I. O. G. T., and the Masonic fraternity, and the auxiliary lodge, Order Eastern Star. He is a man of genial social nature, and pleasing address, and is deservedly popular in his community, and is one of the leading newspaper men of that part of the state.

HON. C. N. VALENTINE. Among the leading and influential citizens of Fargo, North Dakota, is this gentleman, who for fourteen years has been prominently identified with the interests of the state and is now serving as register of the United States land office. He was born in La Porte county, Indiana, May 14, 1850, and is a son of William and Samantha (Taylor) Valentine, both natives of New York, the former born in 1804, the latter in 1811. The paternal grandfather, Alexander Valentine, also a native of New York, was a soldier of the Revolutionary war and later was a commissioned officer in the state troops. In 1849 the parents of our subject removed from New York to Michigan, where the father followed farming until his death, which occurred in 1875. In his family were six sons, but our subject is the only one of the number living in Dakota.

On the home farm in Berrien county, Michigan, C. M. Valentine was reared to manhood, and in the public schools of his neighborhood he acquired a good practical education. For a time he was engaged in the drug trade in Three Oaks, that state, and from there removed to Benton Harbor, Michigan, where he had charge of a lumber pier and later engaged in boating, and was employed as bookkeeper for four years. In 1886 he came to La Moure, North Dakota, where he was successfully engaged in the drug business until February, 1897, when he was appointed to his present position, that of register of the land office at Fargo.

On the 27th of September, 1876, Mr. Valentine was united in marriage with Miss Lucy Wilcox, a native of Wisconsin, and to them have been born two children: Josephine and Maurice. Since attaining his majority Mr. Valentine has never wavered in his support of the Republican party and its principles, and being a man of recognized ability, progressive and public-spirited, he has been honored with some important official positions, having served as senator from the twenty-fourth senatorial district of North Dakota for four years, and county surveyor for the same length of time. Socially he is a member of the Masonic order and is a man of prominence in his community.

THORE BENDIKSEN, a prominent merchant of Walcott, near where he resides on a well-improved estate, is an early settler of North Dakota. He has extensive business interests in the town of Walcott and is an influential and enterprising citizen of Richland county.

Our subject was born in Norway, October 30, 1848. He was reared on a farm in his native land, where he lived until 1870, when he came to America, crossing the Atlantic in a sailing vessel in July of that year. He landed at Quebec and at once proceeded to Crawford county, Wisconsin, where he worked on a farm and attended school till the following spring, and then engaged as clerk in a general store at Mt. Sterling, Wisconsin. He was employed there about six months and then spent some months in Iowa, going from thence to Minnesota. He followed different occupations for two and a half years, and then returned to his native country, remaining there until 1881. He then came again to America, and at once proceeded to North Dakota. He spent about nine months in Walcott, and then took up a homestead claim in Walcott township and engaged in farming for three years on that land, and then removed to the farm where he now resides. His buildings are substantial and the estate is furnished with all of the conveniences of farming, and he is now the owner of five hundred and fifty acres of land. For three years he was employed by the Minnesota & Dakota Elevator Company at Walcott as wheat buyer, and during that time engaged in the hardware business in that town, and after operating the business one and a half years he disposed of his interests, and was wheat buyer for the Farmers' Grain Association, at Kindred, Cass county, North Dakota. On his return to Walcott in 1896 he purchased a stock of general merchandise, and conducts the business in connection with his farming.

Our subject was married in Christiania, Norway, January 10, 1875, to Miss Martha Thue, a sister of O. R. Thue, of Walcott. Mrs. Bendiksen was born in Norway, September 24, 1849. Mr. and Mrs. Bendiksen have been the parents of eleven children, as follows: Bernhard; Rika; Julia; Maren; Rongvald; Peder died at the age of fifteen months; Peder; Oluf; Theodor; Martin and Daniel. Mr. Bendiksen takes an active part in local affairs, and has held all of the township offices in Colfax township, with the exception of justice of the peace. Politically he is a Populist. He is a member of the Norwegian Lutheran church.

ABRAM L. BEGGS, register of deeds of Dickey county, is deservedly popular throughout that region. He was one of the pioneers of that county, and his career in Dakota has been a successful one and marked with persistent efforts to advance the civilization of that locality. Until recently he was actively engaged in farming, and is now the owner of three hundred and twenty acres of land, comprising one of the finest farms of the county.

Mr. Beggs was born on a farm in Dundas county, Ontario, Canada, July 10, 1861, and was the eighth in a family of ten children, born to Hugh and Mary (Robinson) Beggs. His father was born in Ireland and came to Canada when a young man. He followed the pursuit of agriculture and is now enjoying a retired life in Canada.

Our subject attended the schools near his home until sixteen years of age, when he went to California and worked on a dairy farm for a short time, after which he returned home and remained until the fall of 1882, when he went to Ellendale, North Dakota. He at once filed claim to land in the eastern part of the county on the James river, where he lived fourteen years, and which comprises his present farm land. He was one of the first men to settle in that part of the county, and his estate is now a valuable one. He was elected to fill the office of register of deeds of Dickey county in the fall of 1896, when he removed to Ellendale. His popularity is best evidenced by the fact that he was re-elected in the fall of 1898 by the largest majority given any candidate on the ticket, excepting one instance where there was no opposition, a testimonial of his worth as a citizen and public-spirited man.

Our subject was married near his home in Canada, in 1881, to Miss Manda Bush, a native of Canada. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Beggs, four of whom are now living, as follows: Oscar C., Ethel, Mabel and Ruth. Mr. Beggs is a member of the Baptist church and the Masonic and Eastern Star lodges. He is a Republican in political sentiment and strong in his convictions. Since taking up his residence in Dakota he has rapidly risen in prominence, and is one of the trusted men of Dickey county, and merits his high name.

FRANK SANFORD. Barnes county's well-known and popular register of deeds has an interesting record, and from the study of his life history one can learn valuable lessons. The spirit of self-help is the source of all genuine worth in the individual and is the means of bringing to man success which has no advantages of wealth or influence to aid him. It illustrates in no uncertain manner what it is possible to accomplish when perseverance and determination form the keynote to a man's life. Depending on his own resources, looking for no outside aid or support, Mr. Sanford has become one of the most prosperous and influential citizens of Valley City.

He was born in Liberty township, Jackson county, Michigan, September 25, 1860, a son of James P. and Cornelia (Nutton) Sanford. The mother, who was a native of Pan Yan, New York, died in Michigan, at the early age of thirty-two years, and for his second wife the father married Alice McCormick, of Rochester, New York. He was born in the Empire state in 1830, but since a boy of four years has made his home in Michigan, and is now living on the farm which his father, Abraham Sanford, took up from the government. The latter removed to that state when it was still a territory, and helped construct the old state road from Detroit to Chicago. He died in Jackson county, Michigan, in 1880, at the age of seventy-seven years and five months.

Frank Sanford attended the district schools near his boyhood home and later was a student in the high school at Hillsdale, Michigan. On leaving that institution he went to Logansport, Indiana, where he took a course of study in higher mathematics at the Smithsonian College and remained there until the school was abandoned. On his return to Michigan he taught school for a number of terms in that state and also for one term at Momence, Kankakee county, Illinois.

On the 18th of March, 1882, Mr. Sanford first set foot in Valley City, North Dakota, and at once located land on section 20, township 142, range 59 west, as a homestead. He also took up a tree claim and pre-empted other land. Industrious, enterprising and persevering, he has met with well deserved success during his residence in this state, and is now the owner of a two and three-quarter sections of land in one body, while his wife has a section of very fine land in Griggs county, North Dakota. He was first married, November 20, 1879, to Miss Esther Rhoades a native of Jackson county, Michigan, who died on the homestead in Barnes county, North Dakota, June 26, 1882, and on the 13th of October, 1886, he led to the marriage altar Miss Helen S. Kingsley, a native of New York state.

Mr. Sanford has always taken an active part in political affairs and is a staunch supporter of the Independent party. He has represented his district on the board of county commissioners, being elected in 1891, and in 1894 was first elected register of deeds, in which office he is now serving his third term with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. He is a prominent Mason, a member of the Mystic Shrine which meets at El Zagal temple, Fargo. For the success that he has achieved in life he deserves great credit, for it is due entirely to his own well-directed efforts and good management. During his early residence in this state he would return to Michigan during the winter and teach school in order to defray the expenses of improving his land.

HORATIO C. PLUMLEY, manager and part owner of the "Forum," of Fargo, North Dakota, is a man of more than ordinary intelligence and business capability. He has made a success of his vocation, and is one of the influential citizens of the state, and his paper is widely known. He holds many important commissions and ever performs his duties faithfully and well.

Mr. Plumley was born in Addison county, Vermont, June 15, 1856, and was the son of Frederick S. and Sarah (Clark) Plumley. His father was a farmer by occupation and died in Vermont, and his mother died in Fargo, North Dakota. His father served in the legislature of the state of Vermont, and was a public-spirited and respected citizen.

At the age of thirteen our subject left his native state and went to Mexico, New York, where he was educated in the Mexico Academy, and the high school of Syracuse. He then entered the office of the "Mexico Independent," as "devil," and there learned the trade of a printer, continuing there until 1881, when he went to Fargo, North Dakota, and became associated with the "Argus," first as traveling solicitor and then as night editor and local reporter. In 1883 he was appointed managing editor and continued with that paper until 1891. In October of that year, in company with Major A. W. Edwards, he founded the "Forum," since which time he has been manager of that paper. He is thoroughly acquainted with the calling which he has chosen, and since 1893 has been state printing expert. Mr. Plumley was married in 1888 to Miss Helen S. Green, a native of New York. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is deputy inspector general for North Dakota, and secretary of the board of trustees of the Scottish Rite Cathedral. He is also a member of the Sons of the Revolution, his great-grandfather and his great-great-grandfather serving in the American army from Massachusetts. He has been president of the State Press Association. He served as a member of the state prison board for several years, and was chief clerk of the territorial census for 1885. Mr. Plumley stands for the principles of the Republican party.

ELLIS R. PETERSON. Industry and natural ability are the leading powers in the agricultural as well as the commercial world, and in a new country the display of these talents is more manifest than in a more developed region. Richland county, North Dakota, has many who have made a success of the pursuit of agriculture by dint of their well-directed labor, and a prominent place among that class is accorded the gentleman whose name introduces these paragraphs. He makes his home on section 12 in Garfield township, and although a young man is the possessor of a fine estate.

Mr. Peterson was born in Sweden January 5, 1869, and was the fifth in a family of twelve children born to Andrew and Anna S. Peterson. The mother died in Garfield township in 1894. Our subject came to America with his parents in 1881 and the family settled in Richland county, where Mr. Peterson has made his home since. He is the possessor of one half-section of land in Garfield township, on which he has placed modern improvements and is surrounded by all the comforts of rural life.

Mr. Peterson is a member of the Lutheran church, being secretary and organist of the local congregation, and is a man who is respected wherever he is known. He has filled various local offices of trust and gained the confidence of the people among whom he resides. He is chairman of the township board of supervisors and as an interested worker for education is clerk of the school board. He has a prosperous future in North Dakota and his oneness of purpose in all public affairs has already gained him an enviable place in the minds of all.

FRED D. ALPIN, editor and part owner of the "Ransom County Gazette," has ably conducted the various departments of that paper, and has built for himself an enviable reputation as an editor, and a large patronage for his paper. He is also connected with other financial enterprises and is one of the substantial men of the county. He has made his home in Lisbon for the past fifteen years and is well known as an excellent business man and true citizen.

Mr. Aplin was born in Perry, Wyoming county, New York, May 5, 1858, and was the youngest in a family of five children born to Abner P. and Eliza C. (Meltcher) Aplin. When about fourteen years of age he began working in a printing office, and when sixteen years of age went to Caro, Michigan, to complete his trade. He remained in that state seven years, during which time he was part owner of the "Advertiser." On his way to Montana, where relatives of Mrs. Aplin were living, our subject stopped in Lisbon, in October, 1884, and there formed a partnership with H. S. Harcourt, the original newspaper man of Lisbon, publishing the "Dakota Herald." The "Dakota Herald" and "Dakota Clipper" were consolidated in January, 1886, and the "Ransom County Gazette" was established under the control of our subject and W. S. Buckley. The present partnership with E. S. Kilbourne was formed in August, 1892. The paper is a Republican sheet and stands firmly for the principles of that party. Aside from his newspaper interests Mr. Aplin is a director of the State Bank and director of the Lisbon Building & Loan Association at Lisbon.

Our subject was married, in January, 1883, to Miss Luella E. Cooper, a native of Michigan. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Aplin, as follows: Louis and Harold. Mr. Aplin is prominent in secret society circles and is past master of Shewenne Valley Lodge, No. 12, A. F. & A. M.; high priest of Lisbon Chapter, No. 7, R. A. M.; T. I. M. of Tyrian Council; prelate of Ivanhoe Commandery, No. 8, Knights Templar; R. E. grand king of Grand Chapter of North Dakota; past V. M. of Lisbon Lodge of Perfection, No. 4, and a member of the Scottish Rites and York Rites. He has served as a member of the local school board for two terms and in 1898 was elected mayor of the city of Lisbon.

ESTEN A. BORSHEIM. This gentleman is one of the educational workers of North Dakota and is the present county superintendent of schools of Traill county. He has devoted his career to the profession of teaching and has met with unbounded success. He is a gentleman of excellent education and broad mind, and every need of the community in which he labors is anticipated by him and the standard of education advanced as far as lies in his power.

Our subject was born in Kingservik, Hardanger, Norway, April 11, 1869, and was the younger of two sons born to Anders and Sigrid (Huus) Borsheim, both of whom now reside in Winneshiek county, Iowa. His parents located in Iowa in 1883 and settled on a farm.

Mr. Borsheim attended the common schools and in 1886-87 attended Decorah Institute, and in July, 1888, went to Dakota and visited his brother in Nelson county. In the winter of 1889-90 he taught for the first time in Winneshiek county, Iowa, and the following spring went to Traill county, North Dakota, and began teaching in Garfield township, near the village of Hatton, and then became thoroughly identified with educational work in Traill county, being in the school room almost continuously until the fall of 1896, when he was elected to the office he now holds, and his efficient work and popularity is best evidenced by the fact that he was returned to the same office in 1898. He has worked for a uniform series of text books and has met with success in that line, and he now has under his supervision one hundred school buildings, with one hundred and twenty-six departments and an enrollment of scholars of thirty-six hundred and forty-six and one hundred and thirty teachers. There are four thousand scholars of school age in the county. The average salary of the teachers in the county for the year 1898-99 was forty-three dollars and fifty-two cents. The abolition of the institute and the establishment of four weeks of summer school has tended to raise the standard of instructors throughout the county.

Mr. Borsheim was married, in 1895, to Miss Bertha Wambheim. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Borsheim, as follows: Allie Lawrence, Sylvia C. and Arthur M. Mr. Borsheim is a member of the Knights of Pythias and Modern Woodmen of America, and politically is a Republican.

CHRISTIAN M. JOHNSON. Probably no man in Richland county, in North Dakota, is more interested, financially, in the improvement and development of that region. He is connected with several important business enterprises, and is one of the best known and public-spirited men in that community. He is the possessor of twenty-two hundred acres of land, and he makes his home in section 20, in Dwight township, and has improved his home farm, until it is one of the best in the vicinity.

Mr. Johnson was born in Norway, in July, 1843. He came to America with his parents in 1855, and the family resided in Chicago two years, after which they removed to Houston county, Minnesota, where our subject worked out the first summer at farm labor at five dollars per month. He clerked in a store during the following winter, and later returned to Chicago and was employed in various ways until the breaking out of the Civil war. In July, 1861, he enlisted in Company A, Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and served three years and four months as a private soldier. At the battle of Chickamauga he was dangerously wounded, being shot through the right lung and the right arm. He was left on the field and taken prisoner and held ten days, and by agreement between Rosecrans and Bragg, an exchange of prisoners was effected and Mr. Johnson was sent to the hospital at Nashville, Tennessee, where he remained three months, then leaving improved sufficiently in strength he was sent to the United States hospital in Chicago. He remained there until the following April, when he was ordered transferred to the invalid corps, but refused to comply, and consequently was returned to his regiment, and remained with them through the Georgia campaign, although a sufferer from the wound received in his lung at Chickamauga. He served through the Atlanta campaign and was recommended for a government position by his regimental commander and General Thomas, and was appointed post sutler at Shell Mound, Tennessee, where he remained until about two years after the close of the war, when he went to Meridian, Mississippi, and engaged in the wholesale and retail business of clothing and planter's supplies. After six years he disposed of his business interests in Mississippi and removed to Chicago and engaged in the grocery trade until 1880, when he went to Dwight, North Dakota, and purchased a claim of one hundred and sixty acres in Dwight township, one mile from the town of Dwight. This tract was purchased at a cost of five hundred dollars, and is now valued at four thousand dollars. He engaged in the mercantile business in Dwight, carrying a stock of general merchandise, from 1880 to 1898, when he disposed of the mercantile business. During all this time he was postmaster of Dwight, which office he held until the Cleveland administration. After disposing of his mercantile business he engaged in private banking and real estate loans in Dwight, and was again appointed postmaster under the present administration in 1898. He engages in general farming, and raises some excellent horses and cattle, and his home farm where he resides, one-half mile from Dwight, is supplied with every comfort and convenience of modern farming. He has two thousand two hundred acres of land in Richland county, and is one of the well-to-do men of that section, and is a gentleman who has shown marked ability in business management.

Mr. Johnson was married in Chicago, December 31, 1876, to Miss Minnie Anderson, a native of Norway. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, as follows: Annetta Matilda, Clarence Herbert and Myrtle C. Mr. Johnson takes an active part in church work, and is a member of the United Norwegian Lutheran church of Dwight. He was appointed by ex-Governor Briggs, a member of the board of management of the Mayville, North Dakota Normal School, which office he filled four years. He has held numerous township offices, such as treasurer, school treasurer, etc. He has always identified himself with the Republican party, and was a delegate to the convention at St. Louis, when William McKinley was nominated for the presidency. He was there elected one of the notification committee to apprise Mr. McKinley of his nomination, and went with that committee to Canton, Ohio, and all were cordially received. Mr. Johnson enjoys the distinction of being the first of his countrymen to be called to serve in that capacity. He has on numerous occasions been chosen as delegate to county and state conventions, and is a prominent worker for the principles of his party. His career has been marked throughout by persistent efforts to advance the interests of his community, and he has acquired an enviable reputation and a host of friends, who will be pleased to find his portrait in connection with this article.

WILBUR F. BALL. It is to Mr. Ball's perseverance and indomitable energy that he owes his success in life. He is one of the most prominent lawyers of Fargo and one of the best known men of North Dakota.

He was born in Northumberland, Pennsylvania, June 15, 1843, and is of English descent. Representatives of the family took a prominent part in the Revolutionary war and to it belonged Mary Ball, mother of General Washington. Dabney Ball, our subject's grandfather, was a native of Virginia and a farmer, who died in Washington, D. C. The parents of our subject, John and Sarah (Webb) Ball, were natives of Virginia and Pennsylvania, respectively. The father was a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, as were also three of his brothers, and he preached in Virginia, Maryland and a part of Pennsylvania. He attended college in Baltimore, Maryland, and died in that state in 1845. His wife passed away in 1860.

During his early boyhood Mr. Ball attended the public schools of Virginia and Pennsylvania, but is principally self-educated, as he began the battle of life for himself at the age of twelve years as "devil" in a printing office at Washington, D. C. Later he was employed on some of the old newspapers of that city and was in the office of the "Washington Constitution" for a time. From there he went to Baltimore, Maryland, and subsequently returned to Pennsylvania, working on the "Titusville Gazette" for a time. He next drifted to Canton, Ohio, and from there to Akron, that state. At the opening of the Civil war he enlisted at Canton, in 1861, in the Nineteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, but was rejected on account of his youth. The same spring he again enlisted and went to the front as a member of Company A, Second Ohio Cavalry, with which he served for some months, fighting bushwhackers in southern Kansas and Missouri. He was injured by the fall of his horse and was discharged at Fort Scott, Kansas, in the fall of 1861.

Returning to Meadville, Pennsylvania, Mr. Ball entered the service of the Atlantic & Great Western Railroad as brakeman, and after some months spent in the employ of that company became connected with the Buffalo & Erie Railroad, where he remained until the spring of 1864. During that year he commenced the study of law at Ontonagon, Michigan, and on his admission to the bar, in 1865, opened an office at Eagle River, Michigan, where he engaged in practice until 1868. The following three years were passed at Alexandria, Minnesota, and in 1871 he went to Otter Tail City, where he founded the "Otter Tail Record" and conducted the same for one year. He then moved his plant to Detroit, Minnesota, and edited a paper there in connection with his law practice until 1876, when he returned to Alexandria. In 1878 he came to what is now Fargo, North Dakota, driving across the country, and formed a law partnership with John A. Stowell, then district attorney and prosecutor for the third judicial district, comprising all of what is now the state of North Dakota. Mr. Ball began active practice in Fargo January 19, 1879, and two years later was elected district attorney for the district last above named, which position he filled until 1885. In the meantime he was engaged in private practice with George P. Wilson, of Minnesota, for seven years. Judge Wallin became a member of the firm in 1887. In 1888 General Wilson retired from the firm and business was conducted under the name of Ball, Wallin & Smith until the Judge was elected to the supreme bench in 1889. Since then John S. Watson has been admitted to partnership and the firm is now known as Ball, Watson & McClay. Mr. Ball is one of the most successful lawyers of the state, and is assistant counsel for the Northern Pacific Railroad, with which he has been connected since 1872. He was one of the organizers and builders of the Fargo Southern Railroad and was one of its officers and directors during its existence. He is a man of good executive and business ability, who generally carries forward to successful completion whatever he undertakes, and has been a director of the Merchants State Bank of Fargo for some years.

On the 25th of December, 1865, Colonel Ball married Miss Mary A. Menyweather, a native of Michigan, and they have four children: William M., John G., Frank A. and Sarah G. The Colonel has been a life-long Republican and has taken a very prominent part in party affairs. Socially he is a thirty-second-degree Mason, a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is one of the most prominent and influential citizens of Fargo and is widely and favorably known throughout the state as a lawyer and public-spirited citizen.

WALTER S. EMERY. There is no class of biographies which is more interesting to read than that of the industrious and enterprising farmer's boy who has risen unaided from humble circumstances to a position of affluence and comfort. Prominent among the men of Barnes county who have thus laboriously toiled onward and upward is Walter S. Emery, a prosperous and substantial farmer residing on section 14, township 142, range 58.

He was born on a farm in Somerset county, Maine, June 26, 1861, and is a son of Edwin and Mary (Ricker) Emery, also natives of the Pine Tree state, where the mother still resides. In 1861, at the opening of the Civil war, the father was following the peaceful occupation of farming, but he laid aside all personal interests and in response to his country's call for aid he enlisted in the Seventh Maine Volunteer Infantry. Some months later he was taken ill and died in the service.

During his boyhood and youth our subject attended school and assisted in the operation of the home farm, remaining under the parental roof until the spring of 1883, when he came west. After a short time spent in Minneapolis he went to Turtle Lake, Wisconsin, where he worked in a sawmill one season. In the fall of that year he came to Barnes county, North Dakota, and found employment on the farm where he now lives. In 1884 he took up a tree claim and during his residence in this state he has been remarkably successful, being now the owner of twelve hundred and eighty acres of rich and arable land.

In Valley City, Barnes county, Mr. Emery was married, in March, 1884, the lady of his choice being Miss Martha B. Beal, also a native of Maine, born February 17, 1866. Her parents, Henry and Emily Beal, make their home at present in Wisconsin. Mr. and Mrs. Emery have eight children, four sons and four daughters, all born on the farm where they still reside. In his political views he is a staunch Republican, but has never sought nor desired public office, preferring to give his undivided attention to his business interests. In connection with general farming he is quite extensively engaged in stock raising, and at present has upon his place forty-nine head of good horses and a large herd of high-grade cattle. For the success that he has achieved in life he deserves great credit, as it is due entirely to his own industry, enterprise and good management. He is now one of the wealthiest men in the northern part of Barnes county. Socially he is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JOHN ALM, one of the leading farmers of Richland county, is an early resident of that region. He makes his home on section 36, of Eagle township, and is the owner of one of the best farms of the locality. He has accumulated his property single-handed and is enjoying the fruits of his labors.

Our subject was born in Sweden September 14, 1848. He was employed several years in a sawmill in his native country, and in the spring of 1880 came to America. He went direct to Richland county, North Dakota, and settled on the farm where he has since made his home. He has erected a complete set of substantial farm buildings and made other improvements on the place, looking to the comfort of the family and stock. He now owns six hundred acres of land and has made a success of general farming.

Our subject was married, in Sweden, October

5, 1872, to Miss Mary Nelson. Ten children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Alm, named as follows: Albert, Charles, Hilda, Freda, Helma, Selma, Emma, Axel, Anna and Frank. Mr. Alm has passed through the experiences of pioneer life and surmounted the difficulties which beset the early settler, and aside from gaining a comfortable competence has acquired an enviable reputation in Richland county. He is industrious and systematic in his work and deserves his success.

JUDGE ALFRED WALLIN, now of Fargo, is a member of the supreme bench of North Dakota. In the last half-century, especially, it is seldom that one wins prominence in several lines. It is the tendency of the age to devote one's entire energies to a special line, continually working upward and concentrating his efforts toward accomplishing a desired end; yet in the case of Judge Wallin it is demonstrated that an exalted position may be reached in more than one line of action. He is an eminent jurist, an able lawyer and a leader in political circles.

The Judge was born in Otsego county, New York, February 12, 1836, a son of Charles C. and Dorothy (Strongitharm) Wallin, also natives of New York. The father was a successful physician and surgeon who graduated from the famous old medical school at Philadelphia, the Washington & Jefferson Medical College, and was engaged in the practice of his profession in his native state until 1836, when he removed to Michigan. For fifteen years he practiced in that state and then, in 1851, went to Chicago, where he made his home until called from this life, in 1898, at the advanced age of ninety-two years. The wife and mother died in Michigan in 1851. The paternal grandparents of our subject were born, reared and married in England.

Judge Wallin spent his boyhood in Michigan and attended the common schools of that state until fifteen years of age, when he was apprenticed to a tanner and carrier. He soon mastered the trade and worked at the same until reaching his majority. Feeling the need of a better education he entered the academy at Elgin, Illinois, in 1858, and pursued his studies there for one year, during which time he began the study of law. Later he entered the law department of the State University of Michigan at Ann Arbor and was admitted to practice in Allegan county, that state, in 1864, and subsequently by the supreme court of Illinois. He commenced the practice of his chosen profession at St. Peter, Minnesota, in October, 1865, and continued there and at Redwood Falls, Minnesota, until January, 1883, when he removed to Fargo, Dakota territory. He soon became a member of the law firm of Wilson & Ball, of that city, and later of the firm of Ball, Wallin & Smith, being associated with those gentlemen when the state was admitted to the Union in 1889. At the first election he was elected a member of the supreme bench and was re-elected in 1896, the duties of which position he is now most ably discharging. During his residence in Minnesota he was elected county attorney of Nicollet county and the same in Redwood county, and was also a candidate for district judge, but was defeated by Judge E. St. Julian Cox, of that state.

At Elgin, Illinois, Judge Wallin was married, in 1868, to Miss Ellen G. Keyes, also a native of New York, and a daughter of Eber and Juliette Gray Keyes, and by this union one daughter was born, Madeleine, now the wife of George C. Sikes, an editorial writer on the "Chicago Record." The Judge has always been a staunch supporter of the Republican party since its organization, and while in Minnesota stumped the state in support of its principles. He is an able jurist and is held in high esteem by the people of North Dakota.

HON. HARRY S. OLIVER, postmaster of Lisbon, Ransom county, is a gentleman of excellent characteristics and one in whom all who honor true citizenship can find a ready friend. He has labored faithfully for the better interests of the state and his county, and thoroughly appreciates the wants of his community. He has been called upon by his fellow citizens to occupy various important official positions, and in every instance has proven his efficiency and has administered the duties of his various offices with rare fidelity and increasing popularity. He is owner of a fine estate about twelve miles from Lisbon, and makes his home in the city, placing a tenant on the farm.

Our subject was born in Chautauqua county, New York, July 27, 1855, and was the youngest in a family of eleven children born to Stephen and Mary (Loyd) Oliver, both of whom were natives of Biddenden, England. The father, his brother and our subject's grandfather were wholesale merchants in England and the father of our subject, upon coming to America, purchased a tract of land in New York, a portion of which is now included in the Chautauqua S. S. grounds. The father died in 1859, and the mother in 1866. Our subject received an academic education in the Friendship Academy, and after the death of his father his property was lost through the decline in oil. He went to work in Jamestown, New York, in a wholesale house and operated a hardware store in Friendship, New York, for a short time. He went to Lisbon, North Dakota, in 1880, and in December of that year purchased a farm about twelve miles from the city. He located there permanently in 1881 and opened up a large wheat farm, which soon covered one thousand acres of land. The family joined him in 1882. In 1884 our subject became interested in stock raising and now has a general farm, operated by a tenant.

Our subject was married, in 1879, to Miss Florence Waterhouse. Two sons have been born to Mr.

and Mrs. Oliver, as follows: Fred and Harry. Mr. Oliver is a staunch Republican and is firm for the gold standard, and is one of the few men who stood firm for the principles of his party in 1895 and 1896, as regards that issue. He served as county assessor in 1882 and in 1884 was chairman of the county central committee and was re-elected in 1888, 1894 and 1896. He was a member of the territorial legislature in 1885 and 1886 and a member of the state legislature in the second and third sessions. He was the author of the "Open Wheat Market Bill," providing for the right of an individual to erect elevators. He was also chairman of the committee of county boundaries and Oliver county was named in his honor. In the special session of 1892 he introduced and secured the passage of the "platform bill." He was chairman of the committee on banks and banking in 1891 and in 1892 was chairman of the committee on grain grading and warehousing. He has attended all but one state and territorial convention since going to Dakota and numbers a large list of friends and acquaintances in all parts of the state. He is prominent in secret society circles and is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Modern Woodmen of America and Royal Arcanum, and is commander of the Knights Templar commandery.

MILTON D. WILLIAMS, who is successfully pursuing agriculture in township 140, range 63, is one of the pioneers of that locality, and has aided in the development of Stutsman county. His active public spirit and good citizenship has never been called in question and he is one of the substantial farmers of his county.

Our subject was born on a farm in Bedford county, Pennsylvania, July 29, 1849. His father, George W. Williams, was born and raised on the same farm, on which the grandfather, John Williams, settled in 1801. He was of Welsh descent, and was one of the first settlers of Pennsylvania. The mother of our subject, who bore the maiden name of Margaret Deal, and was born and raised in Bedford county, Pennsylvania, and was of German descent.

Our subject was the seventh in order of birth in a family of ten children, and received a common-school education and also attended Tipton Seminary and Millersville State Normal. After completing his studies he engaged in teaching and followed that profession ten years, after spending one summer in Nebraska. He went to Nemaha county, Kansas, in the spring of 1879, and located on a farm, where he followed that calling three years, and on account of ill health went to North Dakota in March, 1882. He selected land as a homestead and tree claim northeast of Montpelier, in Stutsman county, and erected a small house and stable, and in the fall of that year was joined by his family. He engaged in farming there seven years, and then removed to section 9, in township 140, range 63, where he resided six years, and then purchased the south half of section 18, in township 140, range 63, on which place he now resides and has added valuable improvements. His farm consists of four hundred and eighty acres, with about three hundred acres under cultivation, and Mr. Williams operates about twenty-one hundred acres, and is one of the most extensive farmers of Stutsman county. He follows general farming, but his interests are in the main the raising of the cereals. He has a complete set of substantial farm buildings and all necessary farm machinery, including a steam threshing rig, and threshes his own grain. When he went to Dakota he had but a few personal effects and no money, but by dint of his own efforts he has become one of the substantial men of that region. He worked in a lumber yard during the first summer in Dakota and also broke land for others with an ox-team, and engaged in that work over a great portion of the county. He worked for others until 1884, when he began farming for himself.

At the age of twenty-four years, our subject was married to Miss Mary E. Hartman, who was born and raised near Hagerstown, Maryland, and is of German descent. Mrs. Williams is a lady of considerable education and was a teacher for one year. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Williams, as follows: Margaret E., married; Hartman and Calvin, twins, and the latter is now in South America, representing a machine company; Lawrence, who has recently returned from the Philippines, and is a member of the First North Dakota Infantry—these four were born on the same farm in Pennsylvania where their father and grandfather were born; George, born in Kansas; and Ruth and Elizabeth, born in North Dakota. Mr. Williams is a Populist in political faith and stands firmly for his convictions. He was presidential elector in 1892, and was the nominee of the Populist party in 1898 for the state legislature, and was chairman of the first Populist state central committee, and was active in the organization of the party. He was secretary of the state Farmers' Alliance from November, 1889, to June, 1891, and was president of the same from June, 1892, to June, 1893. He was land commissioner of North Dakota from April, 1893, to July, 1895, and was the first to be appointed in that capacity. He has attended as delegate every state convention of his party, and takes an active part in state and county affairs. His earnest labors have been given with a oneness of purpose which has commended him to all alike.

WILLIAM McGUIGAN, proprietor of one of the fine farms of Maple River township, Cass county, is one of the energetic and well-to-do citizens of his locality. He went to Dakota without means, and by persistent effort and economical methods has placed himself in comfortable circumstances, and is accorded a prominent place among those of his calling.

Our subject was born in county Down, Ireland, August 2, 1857, and was a son of Bernard and Susanna (Allister) McGuigan, both of whom were natives of county Down. His father was a farmer by occupation and remained in his native land until his death, which occurred February 22, 1899. The mother came to the United States in May, 1899, and now resides with our subject. Our subject has six brothers and one sister, all in North Dakota with the exception of one brother now residing in Oregon.

Mr. McGuigan was reared in Ireland and educated there and later followed farming in his native isle until 1883, when he emigrated to America and went to Cass county direct, where he has since followed agricultural pursuits. He had but one dollar when he arrived there, and is now the fortunate possessor of three quarter-sections of land, all of which is well improved and furnishes a comfortable income. Our subject was married, April 2, 1891, to Miss Maggie Ross, a native of Canada. Mr. and Mrs. McGuigan are the parents of three children, named as follows: James E., Melvin B. and Mildred A. The family are members of the Presbyterian church and are highly respected in the community in which they reside. Mr. McGuigan has filled some of the township offices, and is actively interested in the welfare of his adopted land. Politically he is independent, and is a man of progressive ideas and is deservedly popular with his associates.

WILLIAM A. BENTLEY, M. D. The world has little use for the misanthrope. The universal truth of brotherhood is widely recognized also that he serves God best who serves his fellow men. There is no profession or line of business that calls for greater self-sacrifice or more devoted attention than the medical profession, and the successful physician is he who, through love of his fellowmen, gives his time and attention to the relief of human suffering. Dr. Bentley is one of the ablest representatives of this noble calling in Bismarck, and is today at the head of the Northwestern Sanatorium in that city. His portrait is presented on another page.

He was born in Lebanon, New London county, Connecticut, November 30, 1837, a son of Eleazer and Fidelia (Henry) Bentley, natives of Connecticut and Massachusetts, respectively. His father also studied medicine but never engaged in practice and for many years taught school. He died in his native state in 1865, and his wife in 1867. In their family were three sons and one daughter. One son was drowned off Long Island in 1852, and the other brother of our subject is now a dentist at Hopkinton, Iowa, while the sister is still a resident of Connecticut.

Reared in his native state, Dr. Bentley began his education in its public schools; and later attended H. A. Balcom's Private English and Classical Academy, and Bacon's Academy at Colchester, Connect-

The Doctor was in the service one year, and was with General Curtiss in Arkansas. Besides the battle of Pea Ridge he took part in a number of small engagements. He was discharged on account of disability.

In 1863, Dr. Bentley went to St. Paul, Minnesota, where he engaged in newspaper work for some time. For a time he was engaged in practice with Dr. Woodworth, in St. Paul, and then moved to Rush City, Minnesota, where he remained for several years. In July, 1877, he came to Bismarck, North Dakota, where he has since engaged in practice with marked success, not only in the city but throughout the surrounding country and towns along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. In connection with his private practice he also conducted the Northwestern Sanitarium as proprietor and manager.

In 1860 Dr. Bentley was united in marriage with Miss Emily A. White, a native of Massachusetts, who died in 1894, leaving five children, namely: Hattie F., Nellie S., Emma E., Charles A. and Miriam H. The Doctor is a charter member of the Chicago Official Surgical Association, and is acknowledged to be one of the best and most skillful physicians and surgeons of the state. He served as physician at the state penitentiary for five years, and has been county and city physician several terms. He is also a prominent factor in public affairs, and was mayor of Bismarck for four years. He is president of the board of health of Burleigh county, and has been president of the United States pension examining board since 1891, prior to which time he was its secretary for ten years. He was president of the board of trustees of the State Soldiers' Home during the period of its construction and for some time afterwards, and was president of the board of trustees in charge of state capital lands and property from 1889 to 1896. He organized the First Regiment Dakota National Guards, under Governor Pierce, and became its colonel, which rank he held for seven years. He was then commissioned adjutant-general by Governor Burke and served as such for two years. Socially the Doctor is a man of considerable prominence; is past grand master of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows for both North and South Dakota; and past grand treasurer of the Masonic Grand Lodge. He is a thirty-second-degree Mason and is in line for the thirty-third degree. He is also an influential member of the Grand Army of the Republic and past department commander of the state. Politically he is a Republican, but is an advocate of the coinage of silver on an equal basis with gold. While at Rush City, Minnesota, he was elected to the state legislature and was a member of the North Dakota legislature in 1893. Wherever he goes the Doctor wins friends and has the happy faculty of being able to retain them. In 1897 Dr. Bentley was the nominee of the opposition caucus in election for United States senator for the state of North Dakota, and received twenty-seven votes, which was the entire vote of the opposition to Senator Hansbrough.

He is proprietor of a fine farm in Norway township, and his residence is located in section 32.

THOMAS D. PARSONS. "Fairview Farm," in Mooreton township, Richland county, is one of the largest estates in that region, and is under the management of one of the progressive, intelligent gentlemen of the vicinity, the subject of this review. He is making a success of his work and has been entrusted with the entire management for several years past. He is yet a young man, but has shown marked ability for business, and is enterprising and careful in detail.

Mr. Parsons was born on a farm in Steele county, Minnesota, December 23, 1860, and was the son of George and Mary (Paul) Parsons, both of whom were natives of Somersetshire, England. Our subject was one of nine children, as follows: Henry, Anna, Mary, William, Louisa, Thomas D., Charles H., Sarah F. and George F.

Thomas D. Parsons was reared in his native county and educated in the common schools, and later attended Pillsbury Academy at Owatonna. After leaving the school room he was employed by the Walter A. Wood Harvester Company as traveling salesman, and was in their employ as such for about ten years. He entered the employ of W. P. Adams in 1889, and after two years assumed the management of the entire farm, which comprises nine sections of land. During the harvest and threshing season one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five men are at work, and during the fall and spring forty to fifty men are under his employ. The farm is owned by W. P. Adams, of Chicago, and Mr. Adams entrusts every branch of the work to the management of Mr. Parsons. He has so well conducted the farm that he has made of it one of the best in the county, and his labors have been satisfactory in every way.

Our subject was married, at Milford, Massachusetts, November 24, 1892, to Miss Jennie L. Phipps, daughter of Waldo and Margaret (Clafin) Phipps, the father a native of Hopkinton, Massachusetts, and the mother of Holliston, Massachusetts. She is a lady of refinement and has inherited the housewifely in-stinets of the New England home. Two children have been born to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Parsons, upon whom they have bestowed the names of Robert Adams and Mary Margaret. Both our subject and wife are members of the Episcopal church, and Mr. Parsons affiliates with the Masonic fraternity. He is a gentleman who is entitled to much credit for the labors he has put forth for the advancement of his community, and is held in the highest esteem by a large circle of acquaintances. It is indeed no easy task for one to conduct as large an estate as has been placed in his care and bring pleasing results in every instance, and in the handling of those under his employ during the busy seasons he has shown great ability in a business way, and at the same time displayed a spirit of kindness which has gained him many friends and assured him success.

The W. P. Adams farm is widely known and deserves the highest praise for its high state of cultivation, good crops and its neatness in every detail, and is one of the very best in the state, being almost entirely under cultivation.

MAJOR JOHN H. FRAINE. This gentleman occupies a prominent and influential position as a member of the North Dakota bar. He has an extensive practice in Grafton, North Dakota, and his practice has brought him in contact with the most learned members of the profession in the state, and he is recognized as a gentleman of broad ideas and excellent qualities. He has recently returned from the Spanish-American war with the rank of major, and during his service earned high honors for loyalty and bravery.

Our subject was born near Sheffield, Nottinghamshire, England, September 7, 1861, and is the son of John and Elizabeth (Cook) Fraine, the former a native of Ireland, and the latter of England. His father was an ivory-worker and came to America in 1866 and settled in Brooklyn, and now resides in Waterbury, Connecticut.

Our subject is one of the four sons who grew to manhood, of whom one brother and our subject reside in North Dakota. Mr. Fraine was reared and educated in Springfield, Massachusetts, and remained in that state until 1878, and then spent some years in travel. He came to North Dakota in 1885 and settled at Grafton, where he finished reading law and was admitted to the bar in May, 1891. He at once began the practice of his profession and continued alone until January 1, 1893, when he formed a partnership with Judge Sauter, which existed until Judge Sauter was appointed district judge of the newly created seventh judicial circuit. Mr. Fraine gave his entire attention to the practice of law until the breaking out of the Spanish-American war, when he enlisted, April 26, 1898, as captain of Company C, First North Dakota Infantry. Prior to that he had been captain of Company C for five years as a member of the National Guard. He sailed for Manila in May, 1898, and served seventeen months, and was discharged with the rank of major of the First North Dakota, Second Battalion. During the service he participated in twenty-four engagements, including the battle of Manila, Santa Cruz, and was with General Lawton in three campaigns. He served with distinction and honor to himself and country. He has met with good success as an attorney and has an increasing practice.

Our subject was married, in 1882, to Miss Marian Robinson, a native of Massachusetts. Mr. and Mrs. Fraine are the parents of one son, named John R. Mr. Fraine is prominent in secret society circles, and holds membership in the Masonic fraternity, Order of Elks and the Independent Order of Foresters. He is independent in political faith, and wields his influence for good local government.

NELSE C. RUKKE belongs to that class of enterprising and intelligent farmers whose homes are places of social and mental comfort, and whose work as developers of the country is a credit alike to themselves and the community. His estate is in Pilot Mound township, and his pleasant residence is situated in a picturesque spot on the banks of the Shyenne river, in section 1. He was the first settler of that township, and is widely known and highly esteemed.

Our subject was born in Norway, December 4, 1840, and was the seventh in a family of twelve children, six sons and six daughters, born to Christian and Ture (Syverson) Rukke, both of whom died in Minnesota. A brother of our subject, Sever, was a member of the Sixth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry during the Civil war, and died in camp at Helena, Arkansas.

Mr. Rukke came to America with his parents when three years of age, and the family located on a farm in Rock county, Wisconsin, where he received his first educational training, and in 1857 removed with his parents to Brown county, Minnesota, and there grew to manhood and assisted his father on the farm until the breaking out of the Civil war. He enlisted in Company E, Second Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, at St. Peter, Minnesota, in April, 1861, and the regiment was consigned to the Fourteenth Army Corps, under command of General George Thomas. Mr. Rukke served four years, and was wounded at the storming of Missionary Ridge, November 24, 1863, and in consequence was confined in the hospital at Evansville, Indiana, six months. He participated in the battles of Mill Spring, Kentucky; Corinth, Mississippi; Shiloh; Perryville, Kentucky; Chickamauga, Chattanooga and others, and marched three months with Sherman from Dalton to Atlanta.

After his return from the war Mr. Rukke purchased a half-section of railroad land near his father's farm in Minnesota, and there engaged in farming for some years. He was elected county treasurer of Brown county, Minnesota, in 1870, and was elected in the same capacity three times, and after leaving that office he removed to St. Paul, where he became traveling representative for the Walter A. Woods Harvesting Machine Company, under Fuller & Johnson, general agents for the Northwest. He remained with them about six years, and then went to North Dakota and secured a position with Bayam & Hoiland, at Mayville. He was in their employ one year, and in 1884, in company with Mr. Hoiland, engaged in the machine business at Cooperstown, and were the pioneers in that line. The following year our subject disposed of his interests to Knute Thompson & Finley, and he removed to his farm, where his family had resided since locating in the state. He has continued farming since, and is now the owner of five quarter-sections of well-improved land, all of which is located in Griggs county.

Our subject was married, in 1868, to Miss Guro Odegard, a native of Norway, who was born May 9, 1850, and was a daughter of Thore and Guro Odegard. Mrs. Rukke's father now resides in Cooperstown, North Dakota, and the mother died in that city in 1896, aged seventy-six years. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Rukke, as follows: Christian W. died at the age of five years; Agnes T.; Christian W.; Elma died at the age of twelve years; Guy V.; Seward died at the age of three years; Nellie G. and Elma S. Mr. Rukke is prominent in public affairs in his township and county, and served on the first board of county commissioners after the county was organized, and has been chairman of the board of supervisors of his township for the past six years. He is a member of Rockwell Post, G. A. K., at Cooperstown, North Dakota. Politically he is a Republican, and stands firmly for the principles of his party.

GEORGE A. BANGS. Among the younger professional men of Grand Forks county, North Dakota, who are rapidly attaining prominence, may be mentioned Mr. Bangs, of Grand Forks. He is a gentleman of good education, energetic and progressive, and enjoys the highest esteem of his fellowmen. His success has been unbounded since taking up the practice of law, and he has built up a large and remunerative practice and is one of the substantial citizens of that city.

Our subject was born in Le Sueur county, Minnesota, November 1, 1867, and was a son of Alfred W. and Sarah D. (Plowman) Bangs. A brother of our subject, Tracy R. Bangs, is also well known in North Dakota, and a sketch of his life appears elsewhere in this work. Mr. Bangs was reared and educated in his native county and attended the high school, and studied law first in his father's office, and in 1882 went to Grand Forks, North Dakota, as a clerk in the land office. He also held a claim to land in that vicinity and remained in the land office until 1892. He then spent two years in the study of law in the office of Tracy R. Bangs and

C. J. Fisk, and was admitted to practice in the fall of 1893. He had purchased an interest in the above named firm, and after being admitted to the bar remained with them until July, 1895, when Tracy R. Bangs retired from the firm, and it then existed as George A. Bangs and C. J. Fisk until Judge Fisk was chosen for the bench. Mr. Bangs was appointed city attorney in 1896, and is now serving in that capacity. He was elected state's attorney for Grand Forks county in 1898 and is acting in that office.

Our subject was married, in 1889, to Miss Maria A. Griggs, a niece of Captain Griggs, a sketch of whom appears on another page of this volume. Mrs. Bangs died March 10, 1891. Mr. Bangs was married in North Dakota to Miss Xenia Gilbreath, a native of that state. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias and at present is grand chancellor of the state. He also holds membership in the Order of Elks. Politically he is a Democrat, and is firm in his convictions, but takes little part in political movements. He is one of the learned members of his profession, and is deservedly popular with the people.

HON. JOHN H. WORST. Faithfulness to duty and strict adherence to a fixed purpose in life will do more to advance a man's interests than wealth or adventitious circumstances. The successful men of the day are those who have planned their own advancement and have accomplished it in spite of many obstacles and with a certainty that could have been attained only through their own efforts. This class has a worthy representative in John H. Worst, ex-lieutenant-governor of North Dakota, and president of the Agricultural College at Fargo. A portrait of President Worst is presented on another page.

He was born in Ashland county, Ohio, December 23, 1850, and is a son of George and Margaret (Martin) Worst, natives of Ohio and Pennsylvania, respectively. The father, who was a farmer by occupation spent his entire life in the Buckeye state, where two of his sons still reside. The paternal grandfather of our subject, Henry Worst, was a native of Berks county, Pennsylvania, and a pioneer of Ohio, where he continued to make his home until called from this life.

The early education of our subject was acquired in the public schools of Wayne county, Ohio, and was supplemented by a course at Smithville Academy, Ohio, at Salem College, Indiana, and Ashland University. In his native state he taught school and engaged in farming for ten years, and during the following four years edited the "Fairfield County Republican," of Fairfield, Lancaster county, Ohio. In September, 1883, he came to Bismarck, North Dakota, and the following year brought his family to this state, locating on land in Emmons county. When the county was organized in 1883 he was appointed county superintendent of schools, and served as such for six years. In 1889 he was elected the first senator from the twenty-sixth district, comprising the counties of Emmons, Kidder, Logan and McIntosh, and filled that office for five years with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. At the end of that time, in 1894, he was elected lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Roger Allen, as chief executive, and served his fellow citizens in that capacity for two years, during which time he was appointed president of the Agricultural College at Fargo. He has most capably filled that office ever since, and in connection with his son Clayton is engaged in cattle raising.

Mr. Worst was married, in 1872, to Miss Susan Wohlgamuth, also a native of Ohio, and three children bless their union: Olive J., Clayton L. and Lloyd W. During our recent war with Spain the elder son served as sergeant of Troop G, Third United States Volunteer Cavalry. Mr. Worst has been a life-long Republican, and has canvassed the state in the interests of his party during every campaign. He is a Scottish Rite Mason, wise master of Rose Croix; prelate of the commandery, and past chancellor commander of the Knights of Pythias. He is one of the best known and most highly esteemed men of the state, and his popularity is well deserved, as he has always done all in his power to advance its interests and promote general prosperity.

JOHN J. LIUM, a public-spirited and enterprising member of the farming community of Richland county, has devoted the greater part of his life to agriculture, in the pursuit of which he has met with great success. He is proprietor of a fine estate in Walcott township, wherein he makes his home on section 21.

Our subject was born in Norway, July 7, 1850. He was reared on his father's farm, and resided in his native land until July, 1870, when he came to America in a sailing vessel, landing at Quebec, Canada. He at once went to Dunn county, Wisconsin, where he lived two years, and then went to Eau Claire, where he remained until 1875, going from thence to Richland county, North Dakota. He selected a farm on the Wild Rice river, in Walcott township, and has since made his home there. He now owns eight hundred and eighty acres of land, and is one of the substantial farmers of that vicinity. He has improved his estate, and the buildings upon it are substantial and convenient in construction and neat in design, and every comfort of rural life is supplied for the family and the stock, while ample storage is provided for the products of the farm.

Our subject was married in Richland county, North Dakota, to Miss Olena Branno, a native of Norway. Mr. and Mrs. Lium have been the parents of twelve children, two of whom died in infancy. The surviving children bear the following names: Olena, Mary, Sophia, Julius O., Gustav

A., Mena, Amelia J., Olaf, Bennie and Elder L. Mr. Lium is a prominent member of his community, and works for the advancement of his township and county. He has held various offices of trust in Walcott township, and is held in the highest esteem by his associates. He has become thoroughly identified with American progress and is a worthy citizen of Richland county.

JACOB LOWELL, an honored pioneer and highly-esteemed citizen of Fargo, pre-empted a part of the land on which the city now stands and has been prominently identified with its development and progress for almost thirty years. He has seen the wild lands of the state transformed into beautiful homes and farms, its hamlets grow into villages and flourishing towns, and all of the interests and evidences of advanced civilization introduced.

Mr. Lowell was born in Somerset county, Maine, May 7, 1843, a son of Jacob and Climenta (Thompson) Lowell, also natives of the Pine Tree state, where the father engaged in business as a lumberman and was also collector of customs for some time. Coming to Fargo, North Dakota, in 1871, he took a claim near his son, but died in Stillwater, Minnesota, in 1884. The wife and mother died in Fargo. In their family were four children, three sons and one daughter, but our subject is the only one now living. The grandfather, Jacob Lowell, spent his entire life in Maine.

The subject of this sketch was but eleven years of age when, with his parents, he removed from Maine to New Hampshire, and in 1854 they became residents of Stillwater, Minnesota, where he grew to manhood. He completed his literary education at Hamlin University, Red Wing, Minnesota, where he was a student in 1861 and 1862, and in 1865 and 1866 attended a business college at St. Paul. In 1868 he entered the law department of the Michigan University at Ann Arbor, and on the completion of the course was admitted to the bar.

In 1870 Mr. Lowell came to North Dakota, by way of St. Cloud and Abercrombie, and after spending the winter on Elm river, came to the present site of Fargo in the spring of 1871. Here he pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres on section 18, Fargo township, and began to break and improve his land, but did not follow farming, most of his time being devoted to locating settlers in the neighborhood. Fargo was laid out in 1874, and he took an active part in promoting its interests. He engaged in the practice of law until 1882, when he retired from that business. He was the first county attorney appointed by the governor, and held that position a short time, and later served as county superintendent of schools. He was also a member of the constitutional convention in 1889. He has handled considerable real estate and has met with most excellent success in business affairs, becoming one of the substantial and prosperous residents of the city.

In June, 1874, Mr. Lowell was united in marriage with Miss Lucy Dinsmore, a native of Maine, who died in August, 1878. Three children were born of that union, Anna L., Jacob, Jr., and Alpheus J., but only Jacob is now living. Mr. Lowell was again married, in September, 1892, his second union being with Etta M. Thompson.

Fraternally Mr. Lowell is a Knight Templar Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine. In his political affiliations he is a Republican, but has never sought public office, preferring to give his undivided attention to his business affairs. His father was one of the first county commissioners of Cass county, which was organized in 1873, and served one year. All of that body are now deceased. When our subject located in Fargo his nearest neighbor was fourteen miles away, and is the oldest settler now living in North Dakota with the exception of Martin Skow, who located here in June, while our subject came in October, 1870. He is widely and favorably known and is recognized as a valued citizen of the community with whose interests he has been long and prominently identified.

STEPHEN A. NYE is the well-known editor and proprietor of the "Times-Record," of Valley City, North Dakota, the leading journal of Barnes county and the official organ of the Republican party. He was born in Mt. Sterling, Brown county, Illinois, July 20, 1862, and is the eldest in a family of five children. His father, Stephen Nye, a native of Montpelier, Vermont, made the journey overland to California during the gold excitement in that state, and on his return east settled in the vicinity of Muscatine, Iowa, where he engaged in farming for a short time, being one of the early settlers of that region. He wedded Miss Mary Pigman, who survives him, and is now living in Mt. Sterling, Illinois.

Our subject received a high-school education in his native city and at the age of fifteen entered the "Brown County Democrat" office as an apprentice to the printer's trade, which he subsequently followed in various cities of the East until coming to Fargo, North Dakota, in 1882. Here he worked on the "Daily Argus" for two years and then went to Devil's Lake, where he took up land. At intervals he worked on the "Inter Ocean" at that place, and in October, 1886, established "Church's Ferry Sun." He left there to take charge of the "Devils Lake Inter Ocean" in the fall of 1899, and was connected with that paper until January 1, 1899, when he purchased the "Times Record" at Valley City, which he is now so successfully conducting. He is an able journalist and good business man and has already succeeded in making his paper one of the best published in this section of the state.

In 1896 Mr. Nye was united in marriage with Miss Anna E. Gundlach, of Menominee, Wisconsin, and to them have been born two children, Stephen G. and Ruth. Mr. Nye is a prominent member of Our subject was born near Christiania, Norway, January 5, 1840, and was the only child born to Gilbert and Marte (Hanson) Erickson. At the age of sixteen years he learned the carpenter's trade, and in 1862 he and his father came to America, the mother having died in their native land. They first resided in Spring Grove, Houston county, Minnesota, and our subject plied his trade there for over ten years. He later resided in Allamakee county, Iowa, and about 1878 went to Dakota to make a home for his family. He went direct to Fargo, and during the working months for about six years followed carpenter work in that vicinity. He filed claim to his land in 1883, and in the spring of the following year removed his family to the new home, where they have since remained. His sons operated the farm for some time and our subject continued at his trade. From time to time he purchased additional land, and is now the owner of seven hundred and fifty acres, forming a fine property.

Our subject was married in 1862 to Miss Anne Olson. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Erickson, as follows: Gilbert, deceased; Michael, now residing at home; Mary, now Mrs. O. Feld, of Mayville; Gilbert, residing at home; Emma, deceased; Christina, residing at home; and Oscar, deceased. He is a man of intelligence and active public spirit, and has been a potent factor in promoting the political and social welfare of that region. A portrait of Judge Brinton is presented on another page.

Our subject was born on a farm near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1839, and represents the eighth generation descended from William Brinton, who went to Pennsylvania with William Penn in 1682. William Brinton participated in the battle of Brandywine. The father of our subject, Joseph E. Brinton, was a farmer by occupation, and the mother of our subject, who bore the maiden name of Mary Marshall, came from England in 1816, at the age of three years, and settled in Pennsylvania. The paternal grandmother of our subject was of Irish descent.

Marshall Brinton was the eldest in a family of seven children, and was raised on a farm and attended the common schools and the high schools and received a liberal education. After leaving home he first worked in the milling business, and manufactured flour for the city of Wilmington; then drifted westward and north and located in the copper mines of Michigan, and was connected with mining properties there several years. He taught school several terms in Michigan, and clerked in the office of the mining company, and then assumed charge of the surface work, and later furnished lumber, wood and fuel, under contract, for the mining company. He was in Michigan from 1872-83, except nine months spent in the Black Hills, in 1879, and spent two thousand dollars prospecting and made nothing. He was postmaster at Delaware Mine, Michigan, several years, and was elected township superintendent of schools, and later made a member of the board of county school superintendents, or school examiners, as they are known in that state. He settled in Wells county, North Dakota, in township 146, range 69, in 1884, and his farm was one and a half miles from Sykeston. He took a pre-emption in 1883 and built a claim shanty and began farming, and the following year located permanently on the place. His buildings were the best in the county at the time and were destroyed by fire in 1890, the fire starting by accident. He then removed to the homestead on section 32 in the same township and range, where he continued farming until 1896, and then removed to Fessenden. He was employed as clerk in the county offices there, and in May, 1897, was appointed county judge to fill a vacancy, and in 1898 he was elected to the same office, which he is now filling. He has three hundred and twenty acres of land in Wells county, on which he has arrangements for the operation of general farming, and his barn is a substantial, commodious structure, 64x92 feet, while the land is equal to any in the county.

Mr. Brinton was one of the organizers of Wells county, and was the first public officer in the county, being appointed county commissioner by Governor Ordway. He was the first acting county superintendent of schools, and organized the first seven schools of the county, and was elected a second time as superintendent. He also owns a farm in Seneca county, New York. He is an ex-soldier and can review a brave and loyal service in defense of the Union, and his entire career has been well spent and he now enjoys a comfortable competence.

After his discharge from the service he went to the oil regions of Pennsylvania and remained there thirteen years engaged in the oil business. He went to California in 1874 and spent two years mining in the southern part of that state and then returned to Pennsylvania. The first issue was dated June 21, 1894, and the paper has steadily increased in circulation since that time and is now one of the first sheets of that region. Mr. Clough was elected principal of the Abercrombie high school in 1894, and held that position one year. Since living in Abercrombie he has taken an interest in bee culture, and now has an apiary of fifty-four colonies. Mr. Clough is a man of inventive mind, and when fourteen years of age began working on a check rower, on which he obtained a patent in 1883, which five years later he disposed of at a good figure.

Our subject was married at Abercrombie, Richland county, August 4, 1894, to Miss Tilda Sime, who was born near Decorah, Winneshiek county, Iowa. Mrs. Clough was a teacher in the schools of Abercrombie for seven years. She died in that village March 27, 1896, leaving two daughters, twins, named Matilda Mary and Tillie Marie. The daughters died in September, 1896. Mr. Clough married Lou Johnson, in Abercrombie, April 5, 1897. Mrs. Clough was born in St. Croix county, Wisconsin. Mr. Clough is a man of genial nature and has a host of friends.

WILLIAM STREHLOW. The business and social interests of Cass county have been carefully guarded and provided for by the gentleman whose name appears at the head of this article. He is one of the pioneers of that region, and since taking up his residence there he has labored with untiring perseverance for the upbuilding of the better interests of his community, and is held in a high position in the minds of his associates. He is engaged in the farming implement business in the city of Casselton, and has been identified with the various enterprises of that city, including the First National Bank, in which he was formerly a director, stockholder and vice-president.

Our subject is a native of Germany, and was born in the city of Berlin, April 30, 1844, and was a son of Frederick and Elizabeth (Menge) Strehlow, both of whom were natives of Germany. His father was a farmer by occupation and came to America in 1849, and settled at Watertown, Wisconsin, where he purchased land and resided until 1864, when he moved to Winona county, Minnesota, and later to DeForest, Wisconsin, and there made his home until his death in 1894. The mother of our subject died in 1892. They had four sons and three daughters; three sons and two daughters are now living, and our subject and one sister reside in North Dakota.

Mr. Strehlow was reared and educated in Wisconsin, and October 1, 1861, enlisted in Company K, Third Wisconsin Cavalry, and served until February 14, 1865. He was with the Third Army Corps most of the time under General Scofield, and was engaged at Cane Hill, Prairie Grove, Fort Smith, and Van Buren, and the raid in Texas, and was wounded twice during the service, once receiving a bayonet wound in his elbow and being once shot through the left leg, but he lost little time from active service and remained until the close of the war. After his discharge from the service he returned to Minnesota, and spent some years at farming and various business pursuits in Minnesota and Wisconsin until 1877. In that year he went to Cass county, North Dakota, and entered claim to land as a homestead and tree claim in Addison township, built the first shanty and was the first settler in that township, and was the founder of the large German settlement of that vicinity. He remained on his claim the first year alone and was then joined by his family. He removed to Casselton in the fall of 1879, where he has since resided, and is engaged in the handling of farm implements. He has met with eminent success in his business and is regarded as one of the solid men of Cass county.

The subject of this sketch was married in Wisconsin, in 1869, to Mary Buckholz, a native of Germany. Three sons and four daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Strehlow all of whom, with the exception of one daughter, reside in Casselton. Mr. Strehlow is actively interested in the government of his township and town and has served as mayor of Casselton, and twice as county commissioner of Cass county. He is a staunch advocate of the principles of the Democratic party, with which party he has affiliated throughout his career. His name is closely linked with the history of that region and much credit is due him for his energetic efforts in furthering its interests.

OLUF HAGEN, county auditor of Traill county, is one of the rising young men of North Dakota. He is a gentleman of exemplary character, and the people repose confidence in him. He is ably discharging the duties of his position as a public officer, and is among the public-spirited men of the county.

Our subject was born near Lillhammer, Norway, August 24, 1867, and was the fourth in a family of six children, born to Ole and Anna (Hagen) Hagen. His parents died in Norway and our subject and two older brothers are the only surviving members of the family. His father was a land owner of comfortable circumstances, and our subject remained at home until seventeen years of age, when he emigrated to America, and at once went to Wisconsin, where an uncle lived. He engaged in farm work and also in the mills in St. Croix county, and in the spring of 1885 went to Dakota and worked at farm labor, making his home at Clifford Traill county. He entered Bruflat Academy at Portland, in 1888, and spent two winters in the business course, completing the same in Curtiss Commercial College, graduating with the class of 1891. He returned to Traill county and taught school one term, and then went to Grand Forks University to perfect himself in the English language. His education was obtained by his own efforts, and he has acquired a thorough business training since taking up his residence in North Dakota.

Mr. Hagen is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and Modern Woodmen of America. He was appointed deputy treasurer of Traill county in 1894, and served one year, followed by four years as deputy county auditor, and in 1898 he was elected to his present office as county auditor. He was well qualified for the position, having become familiar with the duties while deputy auditor, and is recognized as a gentleman of true citizenship.

JOHN W. VON NIEDA, a worthy representative of the moneyed interests of Fargo, North Dakota, is now president of the Red River Valley National Bank, one of the most solid financial institutions of the state. It was founded in 1881 with a capital stock of $100,000, and its first officers were L. S. Fallett, president; W. A. Kindred, vice-president and L. W. Fallett, cashier. When L. S. Fallett resigned the presidency in 1891 he was succeeded by J. W. Von Nieda, who had served as vice-president for six months previous. Stephen Gardner had succeeded Mr. Kindred as vice-president, and R. S. Lewis had succeeded L. W. Fallett as cashier, but is now serving as vice-president, while J. E. Hyde is the present cashier. The present board of directors consists of the following: W. B. Hancock, R. S. Lewis, James E. Hyde, E. A. Perry, J. E. Montgomery, F. A. Irish, J. H. Lewis and J. W. Von Nieda. They do a general banking business; have over seven hundred thousand dollars in deposits and a surplus of fifty thousand dollars, the largest in the state.

Mr. Von Nieda, of whom a portrait will be found in connection with this sketch, was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, October 3, 1844, a son of George and Elizabeth C. (Carling) Von Nieda, also natives of Pennsylvania. He was reared in his native city and educated in its public schools. At the age of sixteen he commenced clerking in a wholesale store, and later learned the drug trade, which he followed for twenty-two years, twelve years in Pennsylvania and ten years in Fargo, North Dakota. In 1877 he removed to Minneapolis, Minnesota, and for five years represented the firm of Anthony Kelley & Company on the road, traveling all over North Dakota and northern Minnesota, and driving over much of the territory. Coming to Fargo in 1882, he opened a wholesale drug house, and for five years was associated in business with J. B. Raboteau. In 1892 he sold that business and has since given his entire time to his banking interests. He is a wide-awake, energetic business man of keen discrimination and sound judgment.

In Pennsylvania, Mr. Von Nieda was married in 1865, to Miss Florence Hughes, a native of that state, and to them have been born three children: Charles K., Maggie E., and George, now in Ann Arbor Michigan. During the Civil war Mr. Von Nieda enlisted in Company K, First Philadelphia Gray Reserves, and was in active service about two months. In his political views he is a staunch Democrat, and has taken an active part in the campaigns of this state. Fraternally he is a member of the Mystic Shrine of the Masonic order and the United Commercial Travelers. He is now serving as treasurer of the Agricultural College. In business affairs he has prospered, and fortune has certainly dealt kindly with him. His life is a living illustration of what ability, energy and force of character can accomplish, and the city and state have been enriched by his example. It is to such men that the West owes its prosperity, its rapid progress and advancement.

LEONARD A. ROSE is one of Fargo's most able and prominent attorneys. He is also a man who has brought his keen discrimination and thorough wisdom to bear not alone in professional paths, but also for the benefit of the city and state where he now makes his home, and with whose interests he is thoroughly identified. He was born in Ontario, Canada, July 5, 1843, and is a son of David and Patience (Robinson) Rose, natives of Canada and Connecticut, respectively. The father spent his entire life in his native land, where his death occurred, but the mother died in New York. To them were born two sons and two daughters, but our subject is the only son now living.

Mr. Rose was reared and educated in Canada and New York, and in 1864 was graduated from the Provincial Normal School of Toronto. In 1866 he was appointed professor of mathematics in Eastman's Business College, of Chicago, Illinois, and the following year accepted the position of principal of grammar school No. 1, of Davenport, Iowa, where he remained for six years. During that time he was prominently identified with the educational work in Iowa, conducting normal institutes in the state. In the meantime he also studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1880, being licensed to practice in all of the courts of Iowa. In 1883 he removed to Fargo, North Dakota, where he has since made his home. He had visited this state in 1879 and bought property here. In 1887 he was appointed by Governor Church as superintendent of public instruction for the territory of Dakota, and re-appointed by Governor Mellette. He was elected state's attorney for Cass county in 1800, and filled that position for two years, since which time he has successfully engaged in general practice.

Mr. Rose was married in Canada, in 1866, to Miss Annie Thornley, a native of England, and to them have been born five children, namely: Arthur C.; Albert E., who is now receiver in the United States land office at Peavey in the gold fields of Alaska; Pansy; Clara L. and Emma I.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Rose has been a staunch supporter of the men and measures of the Republican party, and has taken an active part in campaign work during his residence in this state. He is one of the most prominent Masons of North Dakota, and has filled all the chairs in the subordinate and grand lodges, being past right eminent grand commander of Knights Templar, past most excellent grand high priest of Royal Arch Masons, past potentate of the Shrine. He is also knight commander of the Court of Honor and has filled all positions in every branch and has recently had conferred upon him the thirty-third degree of Scottish Rite Masonry of the order. He is always courteous, kindly and affable, and those who know him personally have for him warm regard. A man of great natural ability, he has met with excellent success in life, and today ranks among the ablest lawyers of Fargo.

RUEL GALLUP. This gentleman, being one of the pioneer business men of Casselton, is well known throughout Cass county, and is held in high standing as a citizen. He conducts a coal and wood and livery business in Casselton, and enjoys a good patronage, and is a man of ability and good judgment.

Our subject is a native of Randolph, Cattaraugus county, New York, and was born October 1, 1833. His parents, Chester and Phoebe (Scudder) Gallup, were natives of Monroe county, New York. His father was a farmer and followed that calling in New York during his entire career, and died in that state. The grandfather of our subject, James Gallup, was a native of New Hampshire, and was a soldier in the war of 1812, under General Scott. He passed away in the state of New York. Our subject had four brothers, three of whom are now living, and two reside in Cass county, North Dakota.

Mr. Gallup was reared and educated in the state of New York, and engaged in farming there until 1877, when he went to Casselton, North Dakota. He arrived there March 29, and assumed the position of superintendent for the Amenia and Sharon Land Company, and was associated with them two years. He also entered a homestead claim in Amenia, which he proved upon and later sold to Mr. Chaffee. He was made superintendent of the Grandin grain farm in 1879 and was thus engaged three years, and then spent one year as superintendent of the Howe farm. He removed to Casselton, Cass county, in 1882, and engaged in the wood and coal business and later established the livery business. He has met with success and is among the substantial men of his community.

Our subject was married December 24, 1862, to Addie M. Hathaway, a native of New York. Mr. and Mrs. Gallup are the parents of one son, William, who is now engaged in the livery business in Casselton. Mr. Gallup was the first alderman of the city of Casselton, and has served as police judge for eight years. He affiliates with the A. F. & A. M., and is one of the oldest members of the state. In political sentiment he is a Democrat and is firm in his convictions.

GEORGE F. FLETCHER, the enterprising and successful farmer of township 140, range 64, in Stutsman county, is one of the early settlers of that locality, and is well and favorably known. He was born in Ontario, Canada, in 1853.

The father of our subject, Jeremiah Fletcher, was born and raised in Yorkshire, England, and was a farmer by occupation, and was the youngest in the family. When but a boy he came to Canada with his father, William Fletcher. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Darby, was born in England, and came to America when a girl, and her father was a carriage blacksmith.

Our subject was the third in the family and was raised on a farm, and worked with his father on his extensive estates until the spring of 1880, when he went to Nebraska and took charge of his father's farm there, and in the summer of 1882 disposed of his effects and made a visit to North Dakota, when he rented land in Stutsman county. He and his brother-in-law, John Y. Easterbrook, entered into partnership and rented land until 1885. They purchased the south half of section 29, in township 140, range 64, in 1882, and three years later erected buildings and made a home for the two families and our subject's brother, and for several years they all resided there, when our subject bought his brother's and Mr. Easterbrook's interests, and now owns four hundred and eighty acres of land and controls fourteen hundred and forty acres by ownership and lease. In addition to the above he has since purchased three hundred and sixty acres in partnership with John Y. Easterbrook. The firm operated a threshing machine from 1886 to 1892, and were well-known threshers of that locality, and did an extensive business in that line. Our subject engages mostly in wheat raising, and has met with success in that line, and on his estate he has erected a complete set of substantial farm buildings and his place is fully equipped with machinery of modern pattern.

Our subject was married, March 21, 1894, to Miss Catherine Rudsdale, who was of English and Scotch descent, and was born in Perth, Ontario, Canada. Her parents, William and Margaret (Mc-Kerracher) Rudsdale" were both born in Canada. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher, named as follows: Ewert Rudsdale, born April 3, 1895; and Frederick William, born April 4, 1898; both were born in North Dakota. Mr. Fletcher has held numerous township offices of trust and labors for the advancement of his community. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and takes an active part in the social affairs of that denomination, and is a firm supporter of the society. He also holds membership in the Modern Woodmen of America, and is deservedly popular with the people among whom he has resided for so many years.

CHARLES L. ALLEN, editor and proprietor of the "Hope Pioneer," is one of the leading newspaper men of that locality, and although he has been the owner of the paper comparatively few years, he has gained a prominent place among the people of Steele county.

Our subject was born in the suburbs of Indianapolis, Marion county, Indiana, June 21, 1865. The Allen family has been in America several generations, the grandfather of our subject, Joseph Allen, sailing from England during the early days, and settling in Virginia. He later moved to Columbus, Ohio, and finally located on a tract of land south of Indianapolis, Indiana. There were but two log cabins in the vicinity at that time, and he was a pioneer of the days of Daniel Boone. His death occurred in 1878, and the estate is still in the hands of his children. Our subject was the only child born to William and Mary (Constable) Allen. At the age of twelve years he started for himself with two dollars in his pocket, and worked at odd jobs in Des Moines, Iowa, for some time, and then learned telegraphy under his uncle at Panora, Iowa. He went to North Dakota, in September, 1883, and worked at farm labor, and the following year accepted a position as operator for the Northern Pacific Railroad at Cooperstown, North Dakota, and in 1886 entered the printing office of the "Griggs County Courier." He established his first newspaper, the "Tower City Journal," in October, 1890, and two years later erected the first building in Enderlin, North Dakota, and edited the "Enderlin Journal." He purchased his present paper in June, 1895, and has prospered in that work. He erected his present fine building and a handsome residence three years later, and now has a well-equipped plant for newspaper work and job printing. "The Hope Pioneer" was established in 1882, by the Red River Land Company, and that building, together with the hotel Hope House, and a general store, at one time constituted the business portion of Hope, North Dakota. Mr. Allen has recently invested in a valuable farm comprising a half-section adjoining the town on the east, and is enjoying a comfortable competence.

Our subject was married in 1893, to Miss Emma C. Loomis, a native of Prairie du Chene, Wisconsin.

Mr. Allen is prominent in secret society circles, and holds membership in the following orders: Knights of Pythias, D. O. K. K., and Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member of the grand lodge in the last named order. He is a young man of exceptional ability, and is one of the rising citizens of North Dakota. Mr. Hallum was born in Norway, September 18, 1853, and when but six months of age came to America with his parents and settled in Elgin, Fayette county, Iowa. Three years later the family removed to Spring Grove, Houston county, Minnesota, and there our subject was reared to manhood. He received a common-school education and remained there until twenty-three years of age, following the occupation of a farmer. He went to Dakota in the spring of 1876, and engaged in farming in Cass county for three years, removing from thence to what is now Abercrombie township, Richland county. He followed farming there until 1884, when he engaged in the mercantile business in Abercrombie, and now carries one of the largest stocks in the county and is doing a correspondingly large business. He is the owner of fifteen hundred acres of land, most of which is in Eagle township, Richland county.

Mr. Hallum was married in Houston county, Minnesota, in November, 1876, to Miss Sarah J. Bakken, a native of Spring Grove, Minnesota. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hallum as follows: Clara, Carl, John, Christena, Sophia, Arthur, Odelie and Benjamin. Mr. Hallum is a member of the Norwegian Lutheran church of Abercrombie, and has filled various important offices in that denomination, and takes an active part in church work. He was elected to the North Dakota legislature in the fall of 1892, on the Democratic ticket, and served one term. All matters of a public nature are of special interest to Mr. Hallum, and as one of the earliest settlers of Richland county he took an active part in its advancement, and was among the organizers of Eagle township, and chairman of the town board until he removed to his present location.

MATHIAS RUNCK, one of the pioneer settlers of Maple River township, Cass county, is successfully pursuing farming and has been a potent factor in producing solid prosperity of the locality in which he resides. His career has been marked by persistent efforts to advance the interests of those for whom he has labored as well as his own interests and he has been rewarded by the accumulation of an extensive and well cultivated tract of land, and the confidence and esteem of his associates.

Our subject was born in Luxemburg, Germany, January 1, 1843, and was a son of Lambert and Elizabeth (Peshon) Runck, both of whom were natives of the same province in Germany as our subject. His father was an architect and was skilled in his profession, and held a high position. He was employed by the government in planning public buildings and roads. He died in 1805. Our subject had one brother who died in Minnesota, and two sisters, who now reside in Cass county, North Dakota.

Mr. Runck was reared and educated in his native land and followed farming there, and in 1808 came to the United States and located in Winona county, Minnesota, where he worked for one employer eleven years, and then purchased a farm in Waseca county, Minnesota, remaining there until 1882. He purchased the farm on which he now resides from the Northern Pacific Railroad in 1880, and after taking up his residence thereon made the first improvements and now has a well improved estate consisting of eleven hundred and twenty acres of land, and has been remarkably successful in general farming.

Our subject was married in Minnesota, May 18, 1873, to Annie Buchstor, a native of Baden, Germany. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Runck, as follows: Rosa, Joseph, John, Annie, the wife of Andrew J. Thamert, a farmer of Pratt, Minnesota, and Nicholas. The family are members of the Catholic church. Mr. Runck assisted in the organization of his township, and has served as chairman of the town board since that time, and was also treasurer for some years. In political sentiment he is a Democrat. He is a gentleman of integrity, and his success is well merited.

FRANK J. THOMPSON, a prominent attorney of Fargo, is a man of deep research and careful investigation, and his skill and ability have won him a large and paying practice. Prominence at the bar comes through merit alone, and the high position he has attained attests his superiority.

Mr. Thompson was born in Rockford, Illinois, August 23, 1854, and is a son of Jared C. and Sarah J. (Mason) Thompson, both natives of New York. During the 'thirties they removed to Michigan, and for thirty years the father was employed as an engineer on the Michigan Central Railroad. In 1878 he came to Dakota, and after serving the Northern Pacific Railroad in that capacity for ten years, was transferred to the shops at Dickinson, where he now resides. He has two sons: Frank J., of this review; and Fred, also a resident of Dickinson. On both sides ancestors of our subject were soldiers of the Revolutionary war, and were among the minute men who participated in the battle of Lexington. His maternal ancestor was Hugh Mason, who settled in Watertown, Massachusetts, in 1634. His paternal grandfather was John Thompson, who died in Fargo, North Dakota, in 1883.

The literary education of our subject was obtained in the schools of Marshall and Jackson, Michigan, and in the former city he learned the machinist's trade, serving a five years' apprenticeship, but he never followed the same. For two years he engaged in teaching music, and in 1876 began the study of law at Jackson, Michigan, with Higbee & Gibson, both well-known attorneys in that state. Soon after his admission to the bar in the spring of 1878 Mr. Thompson came to North Dakota, and located at Fargo, where he opened an office, and has since successfully engaged in practice of his chosen profession. In 1881 he formed a partnership with H. Krogh, but this connection was dissolved in 1892, and he has since been alone.

At Minneapolis, Minnesota, in November, 1882, was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Thompson and Miss Elmadine Bissonette, a native of Montreal, Canada, and they now have two children: Jeredine and Jack Dacotah. In 1889 Mr. Thompson was elected to the state legislature and was chairman of the judiciary committee of the house. He was appointed assistant attorney-general under Hon. C. A. M. Spencer, and served in that capacity for some time. On attaining his majority he became identified with the Republican party, which he continued to support until 1895, when he became a Populist and is now chairman of the state central committee of that party. He is very prominent in Masonic circles and has taken every degree in the order. He is now secretary of all the state organizations in that fraternity; was potentate of the Shrine six years; is now recorder in the same, and also holds those offices in the Scottish Rite bodies. He also belongs to the Benevolent and Patriotic Order of Elks, the Knights of Pythias, and the United Commercial Travelers. He has always taken a most active and prominent part in public affairs; has stumped the state in the interest of his party at different times, and is the author of the resolution introduced into the first legislative assembly by which native-born children of North Dakota are known as "Bieckertails." He stands high among his professional brethren, and is very popular with all classes of citizens.

Our subject was born in Norway, January 5, 1850. He came to America with his parents when he was sixteen years of age, and the family settled in Filmore county, Minnesota, where our subject lived at home, on his father's farm, until April, 1878. He then went to Dakota with his wife and three children, and entered a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land. He also took a tree claim, on which is his present home. He has erected substantial buildings, and made such improvements as are to be found on a model farm. He engages in general farming, and his estate evidences the careful labors expended on every detail.

Our subject was married in Filmore county, Minnesota, in November, 1874, to Miss Bertha Thompson, a native of Norway. Ten children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Heglie, seven of whom are living, and bear the following names: Ole, Randine, Tina, Oscar, Pauline, Ella and Josephine. Two sons and one daughter are deceased; a son, Julius, died at the age of nineteen years. Mr. Heglie was elected county commissioner in the fall of 1896 on the Republican ticket, and his popularity is best evidenced by the fact that he was elected in the same capacity in 1898. He has held the different township offices in Walcott township, and takes an active part in local affairs. He is an earnest member of the Norwegian Lutheran church.

JOHN NELSON. This gentleman, of whom a portrait appears on another page, is acting as register of deeds of Grand Forks county, to which office he has been twice elected. He is a man of sterling characteristics and is ably and faithfully discharging his official duties and is held in the highest esteem by all with whom he has to do.

He located in Larimore, Grand Forks county, when he went to North Dakota, and purchased land and also acted as agent for the Standard Oil Company and the Great Northern Express Company, and also handled wood, ice, and general dray business. He continued thus engaged until his election to his present office as register of deeds in 1896. His re-election in 1898 is best evidence of his efficient work and popularity.

Our subject was married, in 1868, to Miss Charlotte E. McLlroy, a native of Ireland. Five sons and one daughter have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nelson, named as follows: Clement W., Horace C.,

Alice A., Albert T., Henry R. and Vance W. R., all of whom are living. Mr. Nelson is a member of the Masonic fraternity. He was next employed in the same position at Marion, Alabama, and then went to Louisville, Kentucky, where he engaged four years in the commission business. He gave up farming in 1888, and set up in the mercantile business at Buttzville, Ransom county, and in 1896 began dealing in real estate in Lisbon. This was the first machine firm in the town, and their building was the third or fourth erected in Fessenden. Mr. Regan lost his store buildings by fire, December 27, 1899. His store was 24x100 feet, with an addition 24x60 feet, and was two stories high. valley. Success has attended him financially and socially and he is now one of the most influential men of that region, while the institution with which he is connected is one of the leading banks of the Northwest.

Mr. Titus was born in Oak Grove, Minnesota, June 3, 1851, and was a son of Moses S. and Jane L. Titus, who were natives of Connecticut. His parents settled in Minnesota about 1844 and for many years his father was engaged in business in that state, where our subject was reared and educated. He began life as a farmer and followed that calling in his native state until October, 1872, when he entered the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minnesota, as a general helper, working without wages until February, 1874, when he went to Sauk Center in the employ of Andrew J. Smith, banker, and remained with him at that place until 1879, acting as clerk and bookkeeper. He went to Grand Forks in June, 1879, going by stage by Fisher's Landing, and was the only passenger. He remained several days and traveled from the village through the surrounding country, the fertility of the soil and the possibilities of the country being forcibly impressed on his mind. He returned to Sauk Center for a short time and later located in Grand Forks, North Dakota, August 29, 1879, and in company with J. Walker Smith opened a small bank under the name of the Bank of Grand Forks. This was the first bank on the lower Red river valley and the place they occupied was a small building situated on Third street, between Kittson and Bruce avenues, and was purchased by them from J. G. Hamilton for about four hundred dollars and was 18x26 feet. In the fall they erected a small addition in the rear, but were unable to obtain sufficient lumber that year to complete the building, which was only shiplapper. That building now stands in the rear of the Reder & Stewart block and is used by that firm as a smoke house. The first deposit made in the Bank of Grand Forks was made by Thomas Collins and was for forty-six dollars and eighty-four cents, and the first draft issued was to W. G. Woodruff for seventy-five dollars. The first loan was made to Elias Rice and was for seventy-five dollars. On October 31, 1881, the day the Bank of Grand Forks was superseded by the now First National Bank, the deposits amounted to $234,233.71. To give an idea of the volume of business done in early days, the total aggregate of business done by the Bank of Grand Forks from August 20, 1879, to and including October 31, 1881, amounted to the enormous sum of $14,203,006.94. The Bank of Grand Forks ceased to exist on October 31, 1881, and the First National Bank came into existence, with the following officers: J. S. Eshelman, president; J. Walker Smith, vice-president, and Seymour S. Titus, cashier. In the summer of 1881 Titus Smith erected the brick block now occupied by the Union National Bank, which was the first brick block in the valley north of Fargo and was occupied by the First National Bank for some years. This bank is one of the oldest and also one of the soundest financial institutions of that region, and Mr. Titus has ably discharged the duties of cashier since its organization.

JOHN SATTERLUND. No foreign element has become a more important part of our American citizenship than that furnished by Sweden. A prominent representative of this class is Mr. Satterlund, the present receiver of the United States land office at Bismarck.

He was born in Carlstad, Sweden, May 3, 1851, and in 1869 came to America with his parents, Erick and Mary Satterlund, who located in Traverse county, Minnesota, where the mother is still living, but the father is now deceased. After some time spent in that state our subject came to Bismarck, North Dakota, in 1872, and remained here for some time. Subsequently he spent about four years in Port Arthur, Canada, and then, in 1878, returned to Burleigh county, North Dakota, where he purchased two thousand acres of land north of Bismarck, on which he engaged in farming and stock raising. In 1882 he removed to Washburn, which was laid out and platted by Mr. Satterlund. McLean county was not organized until November, 1883, and Washburn was made the county seat. Upon the organization Mr. Satterlund was chosen the first sheriff of the county and re-elected to that office in 1884. In 1890 he was elected to represent his district in the state legislature and re-elected two years later. Our subject attended the Allegheny College in that city for two years, and then went to Erie, Pennsylvania, and was employed as clerk in a general merchandise establishment one year and later clerked in his father's store at Wattsburg two years and then went to what is now Winona, then Wabasha, and was engaged in the mercantile and real estate business. He continued his residence there from the spring of 1853 to the fall of 1860, when he removed to Texas, but after a few months removed to Ontario, Canada, and was engaged in the oil business about fifty miles from London. After two years he located in Chatham, Ontario, and engaged in the lumber business from the spring of 1863 to August, 1871, when he located in Dakota, about twenty miles north of Fargo. The following June he settled on his present farm in section twenty-four, of Barnes township, Cass county, and has engaged in farming continuously since, and for two years also conducted a livery business in Fargo. He is now the owner of eighty acres of land, one mile from the city limits, and has added such improvements as are found on the model farm.

Our subject was married, in Chatham, Ontario, February 19, 1868, to Miss Sarah A. McKellar, who was born in Kent county, Ontario, March 13, 1845. Mrs. Sanborn was the fifth in a family of ten children born to Archibald and Lucy (McNabb) McKellar, both of whom were natives of Scotland. Mr. and Mrs. Sanborn are the parents of one daughter, named Fernelia Anna, now Mrs. E. D. Naylor. The family are attendants of the First Presbyterian church of Fargo, of which denomination Mrs. Sanborn is an active member. Mr. Sanborn is a wide-awake and well-to-do farmer and attends strictly to his work and is highly esteemed throughout his locality.

ALMON L. LOOMIS, a leading representative of the business interests of Fargo, North Dakota, is the junior member of the firm of March & Loomis, a well-known liveryman of that place. Of excellent business ability and broad resources, he has attained a prominent place among its substantial citizens and is a recognized leader in public affairs. He has won success by his well-directed, energetic efforts, and the property that has come to him is certainly well merited.

Mr. Loomis was born in Ashtabula county, Ohio, January 3, 1854, a son of Almon and Amelia (Morgan) Loomis, who spent their entire lives in that state, the father dying when our subject was only two years old, the mother five years later. In his native state the son passed his boyhood and youth, attending the Grand River Institute of Austinburg and the Orwell Normal Institute of Ashtabula county. In 1874 he went to Chicago, Illinois, and filled the position of traveling salesman for five years. He came to Fargo, North Dakota, in 1879, and for three years was employed as clerk in the postoffice at this place. Subsequently he spent a short time in Montana, but in the fall of the same year returned to Fargo, where he was employed as bookkeeper and was in the real estate business for some time. In the spring of 1887 he embarked in the livery business, which he has since most successfully conducted and now as a member of the firm of March & Loomis is doing a large and profitable business.

Socially Mr. Loomis is a prominent member of the Masonic order and politically is an ardent Republican, taking an active interest in political affairs. In 1890 he was elected to the state legislature from Cass county for a period of two years, and in 1891 was appointed deputy United States marshal, in which capacity he served for eight years. He was appointed postmaster of Fargo in May, 1898, and is now filling that office in a most efficient and satisfactory manner.

PETER ROBERTS occupies a prominent place as a well-to-do and progressive member of the farming community of Foster county, and he has a fine farm in township 147, range 67. He is now retired from active labors and has accumulated a competence to tide him through his declining years.

Our subject was born in Wales, in 1844, and was a son of David and Mary Roberts, both of whom were natives of Wales. His father was one of the early settlers of Wisconsin, and took government land there. He spent the last of his career in his native land, and the mother of our subject died in Wisconsin at the age of eighty-three years. Mrs. Roberts' maiden name was Hughs. The Hughs family was quite a prominent family of England and were professional men, bankers, etc.

Mr. Roberts was the fourth in a family of nine children and at the age of three years came to America with his parents and was reared on a farm in Wisconsin. He was given a good common-school education and attended two terms at Lawrence University at Appleton, Wisconsin. He began for himself at the age of sixteen years and after hiring out one year followed lumbering eight years and traveled from Warsaw, Wisconsin, to St. Louis, Missouri, for many years, and while raft pilot made seven dollars per day. He began farming in Winnebago county, Wisconsin, in 1871, and owned eighty acres of land, part of which was timber land. He made this a pleasant home and from the farm gained a comfortable competence, and when he disposed of his interests there was able to begin in Dakota with some means. He went to Foster county, North Dakota, in 1883, and entered claim to land as a pre-emption and tree claim in township 147, range 67, and erected a house and small barn. He had about four thousand dollars and had all necessary machinery and began farming on an extensive scale. He and his children now own together seven hundred and twenty acres of land, on which he has erected a complete set of substantial buildings. His farm is within two miles of the station and a school building is erected on the land, and he has one and a half acres of forest trees and plenty of good water. Mr. Roberts was stricken with paralysis after completing arrangements for the economical conduct of the farm and the enjoyment of his fortune, and for the past two years has been an invalid and the farm has been in charge of his sons since 1897.

Our subject was married in 1870 to Miss Matilda Edwards, of Welsh descent. Mrs. Roberts' father, Hugh Edwards, was a farmer by occupation. The following children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Roberts: M. Louisa, Edward W. and M. Pierce. The youngest child died in infancy. Mrs. Roberts was an invalid for ten years and her death occurred in 1892. Mr. Roberts has always taken an active interest in the welfare of his community and has held numerous township offices. Politically he is a Populist and is a man of worth and highly esteemed by his fellow men.

HON. CHARLES A. SANFORD. As an all round prominent citizen no man in Stutsman county is more entitled to mention in a volume of this nature, than Mr. Sanford. He has aided materially in the upbuilding of that region, and his present high position among the business men and public-spirited citizens of his community has been accorded him as a fitting tribute to his labors. Aside from extensive land interests in North Dakota, he is proprietor of the "Countenay Gazette," and is also established in the real estate, insurance and collection business, in which he has built up a lucrative and ever-increasing business. A portrait of Mr. Sanford is shown in connection with this sketch.

Our subject was born in Washtenaw county, Michigan, in 1838, and was a son of Ezra and Almira (Chamberlain) Sanford. His parents were of American descent, and his father was born in Vermont, and was a farmer by occupation. He settled in Michigan in 1837, and when our subject was but seven years of age the mother died, and the family moved to Indiana, and after two years returned to Michigan.

Our subject was the youngest in a family of twelve children, and was reared on his father's farm, and at the age of fourteen years he went to Indiana to make his home with his sister. After three and a half years there he returned to his native state and three years later attended the State Normal School and then taught one term of school, after which he entered the Ypsilanti high school, and entered the classical department of the University of Michigan in 1861. He attended this institution three and a half years, and during his junior year he was for several months employed in the office of the auditor-general at Lansing, Michigan, and returned to school in the fall of '64. He was appointed paymaster's clerk in the United States volunteer service in February, 1865, and went to Washington where, in addition to his clerical duties, he continued his studies without instructors, and returning to Ann Arbor in the fall he passed private examinations before his several professors, and was graduated from the University with the class of 1866, with the degree of A. B., and later took the degree of A. M. He then engaged in the lumber business in the Saginaw valley, but fire soon destroyed his mill, and he lost about four thousand six hundred dollars. He spent two years as principal of the ward schools of Lansing, Michigan, and in 1876 was elected superintendent of the Lansing city schools, which position he held nearly seven years, when he was compelled to resign on account of failing health. He went to North Dakota in the spring of 1883, and raised one crop on land east of Jamestown, and the following fall filed claim to the south half of section 26, township 144, range 62, and built a claim shanty and a board barn and began farming. He moved onto this land in the fall of 1884, where he resided until the spring of 1898. He purchased section 35, township 144, range 62, in 1889, and has added to his possessions from time to time since, and is now the owner of extensive and valuable tracts. His home farm consists of six hundred and forty acres, and in 1899 he purchased nine hundred and thirty-four acres of land in the southwestern part of Griggs county. The last named tract is yet uncultivated, but is valuable property. Mr. Sanford engaged in stock-raising and dairying largely while on his farm, and has every convenience on the farm to facilitate the work. His articles on dairying were widely copied in state reports and dairy journals. He retired from farm labors in the spring of 1898 and removed to Courtenay, where he erected the finest residence in that locality, and has since made his home. He established the "Countenay Gazette" in October, 1897, and the following spring assumed charge of the paper.

Mr. Sanford is an influential citizen, and takes an active interest in affairs of a public or religious nature. In 1896 he was commissioned from the Fargo presbytery to the general assembly of the Presbyterian church of the United States, which met in Saratoga. He is secretary and treasurer of the Jamestown Presbyterian College. For several years he has been a director in the Alliance Hail Association of North Dakota. He was elected as a representative to the state legislature of North Dakota in 1898, and is at this writing, March, 1900, chairman of the committee on education, occupies a place on the committee on appropriations, committee on irrigation and on the joint committee on charitable institutions and the joint committee on educational institutions. During Roger Allen's administration he was a member of the state board of agriculture. In 1897 Governor Briggs appointed Mr. Sanford delegate to the farmers' national congress which convened at St. Paul. He did very efficient work and his public spirit is always manifest. He occupied a very eligible seat in the parquet in Ford's theater on the night of April 14, 1865, when President Lincoln was assassinated by J. Wilkes Booth whose escape he witnessed with profound regret.

He has been treasurer of the school district since 1893. Politically Mr. Sanford is a Republican and has attended as a delegate, numerous conventions

A. H. GRAY. The prosperity of any community depends upon its business activity and the enterprise manifest in commercial circles is the foundation upon which is builded the material welfare of town, state and nation. The most important factors in public life at the present day are therefore men who are in control of successful business interests and such a one is Mr. Gray, the leading lumber dealer of Valley City.

He was born in Branch county, Michigan, October 7, 1840, and is a son of B. D. Gray, a native of Hinesbury, Vermont, who came west in the early 'thirties, and in 1849 made the trip overland to California. For some time he was engaged in contracting and building in San Francisco, and many of the important buildings of that city were constructed by him. Our subject attended school at Constantine and Coldwater, Michigan, and at the age of fourteen began his business career as a clerk in the general store of Miles & Culf, with whom he remained for three years. He then accepted a position with John W. Shively, for whom he worked for the succeeding twelve years. After resigning that position he entered the employ of Morris, Deming & Company, of New York, as a traveling salesman, selling hats, caps and furs throughout southern Michigan and northern Indiana for five years. In 1879 he left Michigan and came to Valley City, North Dakota, on the first five-car emigrant train which came into the state over the Northern Pacific Railroad. He at once entered land near the city, upon which he lived for one year, engaged in agricultural pursuits, and then took up his residence in Valley City, where he was interested in the farm machinery business until 1885. In that year he took the agency for the Gull River Lumber Company and has acted as such continuously since. On the 10th of April, 1899, the Valley City State Bank was organized and he was elected vice-president of the same, which office he is now filling with great tact and to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. He is the only man in Valley City who has been continuously engaged in business since his arrival in the state, and is now connected with various business enterprises. He is energetic, progressive and persevering and generally carries forward to successful completion whatever he undertakes.

In 1879 Mr. Gray married Miss Mary M. Barnes, of Goshen, Indiana, a daughter of James and Mary Barnes, now deceased. The father was one of the early settlers of Goshen, always took an active part in the affairs of the city generally, and was engaged in the banking business there for years. Mr. and Mrs. Gray have two children, a son and daughter, namely: Henry B. and Amy M. The family occupy one of the most modern and beautiful dwellings in Valley City, it being located in the northwest portion of the place, and its hospitable doors are ever open for the reception of their many friends. Mr. Gray has taken quite a prominent and influential part in public affairs, and has served as mayor of the city three years and president of the school board for the same length of time.

ISAAC P. CLAPP, one of Fargo's best-known citizens and successful business men, was born in Dutchess county, New York, March 4, 1839, and is a son of Peter B. and Sarah E. (Pells) Clapp, also natives of New York, in whose family were only two children, one son and one daughter, both still living. The father, who was an agriculturist, spent his entire life in the Empire state, as did also the grandfather, Isaac Clapp.

Our subject was reared in much the usual manner of farmer boys of his day, assisting in the labors of the fields and attending the district schools near his childhood home. He followed farming in New York until 1867, when he removed to Norfolk, Virginia, and after residing there for some time he went to central Texas, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits for ten years. He next made his home in Kenosha, Wisconsin, until 1880, when he came to Fargo, North Dakota, landing here on the 14th of October. He soon returned to Wisconsin, however, but the following April located permanently in Fargo, where, as a member of the firm of Clapp & McCrow, he was engaged in the banking business until 1884, conducting the Cass County Bank, which was a private institution. On closing the bank they turned their attention to the real estate business, in which Mr. Clapp is still successfully engaged, and to some extent he is also interested in farming. He is a wide-awake, energetic business man of known reliability and due success has not been denied him.

On the 7th of June, 1882, in Wisconsin, Mr. Clapp was united in marriage with Miss Sarah Sleight, a native of Indiana, and they now have one son, Edwin G., at home. Socially Mr. Clapp is a man of prominence in the community where he has so long made his home, and is honored and respected by all who know him. He belongs to the Masonic fraternity.

GEORGE A. LUCE, one of the leading citizens of Hope, North Dakota, conducts a thriving agricultural implement business and is a wide-awake and progressive man. He was the first established business man of that city, and has met with continued success in whatever line he has directed his abilities, and is the proprietor of a well-stocked establishment, and also engages in wheat raising on his farm near there.

Our subject was born in Wheeling, Cook county, Illinois, August 18, 1842, and was the oldest son and second child born to Benjamin C. and Mrs. Rebecca (Brown) Luce. His mother bore the maiden name of Ruth. The name of Luce is probably a French name, Luci, which has been perverted. The great-grandfathers of our subject, both paternal and maternal, served with the Vermont soldiers in the Revolutionary war, and the grandfather, Andrew Luce, served in the war of 1812.

Until eighteen years of age our subject resided on his father's farm in Cook county, and he attended school, and spent two years in a private school in Connecticut. He purchased forty acres of timber land in Berrien county, Michigan, when eighteen years of age, and developed a fruit farm, and resided in that state almost continuously until 1875, and while there he was agent for a steamboat for three years and bought grain one year. He took charge of his father's farm until 1882, and in February of that year went to Hope, North Dakota. The town was then but platted, and consisted of but one story of the Hope House hotel. Our subject erected the first "shack" in the town, a 14x32-foot structure, and hauled three carloads of machinery sixteen miles across the country from Clifford and established the first business of the city. He was in partnership with C. G. Merriell, under the firm name of Luce & Merriell, and in the fall of 1882 two of Mr. Merriell's brothers joined the firm and introduced hardware, and the firm was changed to Merriell Brothers & Luce. They continued in business thus until 1862, when our subject withdrew, and now conducts the agricultural implement business himself. He enjoys an extensive patronage and is among the well-informed men in that line. He is the owner of one section of land six miles northwest of Hope, and rents out the land, which is devoted to wheat raising.

Our subject is the father of five children, three by his first marriage and two by his second marriage. The elder children bear the following names: Ernest M. C., employed with the Deering Company at Hope; Leona M., now Mrs. J. T. Masters, of Steele county; and Myrtle, now Mrs. George Swingle, of Chicago. Two younger children bear the names of Elsie and Georgie. Mrs. Luce bore the maiden name of Minnie N. Ellsbury. Mr. Luce is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Masonic fraternity, and has taken the thirty-second degree in the last named order. He is a Democrat in political faith and stands staunchly for party principles.

HERMAN G. SHIRLEY, register of deeds of Ransom county, is one of the most popular and efficient public officers of the county. He is a young man of much business capacity, and is interested in an extensive drug business in Enderlin, Ransom county, and is one of the substantial men of that region. He has gained his possessions and good name through his push and energy, having taken up his residence in Dakota without means and but little business experience. He makes his home in Lisbon, and is well known throughout the county.

Our subject was born in Goodhue county, Minnesota, January 29, 1866, and was the third in a family of six children born to Nels H. and Astrid (Olson) Shirley, both of whom now live in Minnesota. His parents were of Norwegian birth and came to America when young, and were married in this country and located on a farm in Wisconsin, from whence they removed to Minnesota.

After attaining his majority our subject went to Dakota and applied himself for two years to farm labor, after which he took a commercial course at Red Wing Business College. He then purchased wheat in Sheldon and other towns, and in 1891 entered a drug store at Sheldon. With W. P. Hoff, he invested in a drug store at Enderlin, in 1898. This store is known as one of the best stocked and most handsomely furnished establishments of its kind in the state.

Mr. Shirley was elected register of deeds of Ransom county in 1894, and had the distinction of being the first candidate chosen from the east end of the county. His popularity is best evidenced by the fact that he is now serving his third term in the same capacity. He is a prominent member of the Masonic lodge, and has taken the degrees of the blue lodge, chapter, Knight Templar, thirty-second degree Scottish Rite, Mystic Shrine, and is at present master of the Lodge of Perfection. He also holds membership in the Modern Woodmen of America and Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Republican.

MAXIME BELLEMARE, M. D. This gentleman is well known as a physician of practical skill and theoretical knowledge, and he occupies a prominent position among the people. He has followed farming and the practice of his profession in Cass county for many years, and makes his home in section 27, in Stanley township.

Our subject was born in St. Maurice county, Quebec, January 24, 1847, and was reared in his native place and attended the Nicolet College. When eighteen years of age he began the study of medicine, attending the University of Victoria, from which institution he graduated in 1871. He followed his profession in Canada until the spring of 1882, when he went to North Dakota and located in Stanley township, Cass county, and has since engaged in farming, and also practiced medicine. He has built up a lucrative practice and is widely known. His farm consists of two hundred and forty acres of land, on which he has completed good improvements, and has gathered about him the comforts of a model country home.

Our subject was married in Canada to Miss Albertine Gerin Lajoie, a native of Canada. Mr. and Mrs. Bellemare are the parents or ten children, as follows: Emma, Corrine, Anna, Marie, Caroline, Joseph, Aurora, Francis, Aurelie and Maxim. Dr. Bellemare has been active in public affairs since taking up his residence in North Dakota, and has held the office of township assessor four years, and clerk of the school district, and has been a member of the board of supervisors of Stanley township. As a man and citizen he is highly respected and as a physician he has built up an extensive practice.

JOHN H. VAN METER, the leading contractor and builder of Dickey county, resides on his homestead farm in Van Meter township. He is the possessor of one half-section of land in section 8, township 129, range 62, but his contracts take his attention so entirely that he rents his land annually and does not attempt farming. He is one of the early settlers and well known as a business man of much ability and a citizen of true worth in his community.

Our subject was born in Newark, Kendall county, Illinois, January 7, 1838. His father, Miles H. Van Meter, was born in Grayson county, Kentucky, March 6, 1810, and died in Hudson, Wisconsin, May 31, 1898. had command of a company that was sent to Ottawa, Illinois, to quell the riot there during the construction of the Illinois-Michigan Canal. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of Mary Litsey, and was a native of Grayson, Kentucky. She died in Hudson, Wisconsin, in the late 'seventies, and was the mother of nine children, seven sons and two daughters, our subject being the fifth child. Of the other children two daughters and one son are at the old home in Hudson; two of the elder sons, D. K. and M. L., are living in Illinois, and are contractors and builders; one son, E. W., resides at Aberdeen, South Dakota; Henry was killed at the battle of Chickamauga; and Abe C. died in the early part of 1899. He was the founder, the editor and proprietor of the "St. Croix (Wisconsin) Republican."

Our subject at the age of fourteen years, went to Hudson, Wisconsin, with his parents, where he at once secured work on the river, and at nineteen years of age was a first-class pilot, plying between St. Paul and St. Louis. He continued to work on the river during the summers and in the lumber woods during the winters until 1861, when, in May of that year, he answered his country's call and enlisted in the City Guards, of Hudson, Wisconsin, later known as Company G, Fourth Wisconsin Infantry, and in 1863 the regiment was merged into the Fourth Wisconsin Cavalry. In 1861 he was in Maryland and Newport News, and left the lower James the day before the Merrimack came out. They were then ordered to Ship Island, Gulf of Mexico, and from thence to the Mississippi river, and were there during the bombardment of Forts Jackson and St. Phillip, under Farragut. Our subject was a member of one of the four companies sent to the rear of Fort Phillips to cut off the retreat of the garrison at that place, and after capturing the garrison were put into gunboat No. 3 and sent to New Orleans, and our subject landed in that city April 29, among the first, and on the night of May 8, 1862, he was put into the pilot house of a Mississippi river steamer to pilot an expedition to Vicksburg, a distance of over four hundred miles, over an unfamiliar course, rendering the task a difficult one. He remained on the river until July, and in the latter part of that month left the canal which he was helping to construct opposite Vicksburg. He was in the hospital at Baton Rouge for a few days, and then participated in the battle of that place, after which they evacuated the city and fell back to New Orleans, and his company was then detached from the regiment and put into the artillery, where he served until the spring of 1863. He was with General Banks on his western Louisiana expedition to Red river, crossing the Mississippi at Bayou Sara, and then went to the rear of Port Hudson to besiege it, and was in the assault May 28, 1863. They were sent to Clinton, Louisiana, June 3, to break up the rebel camp, after which hotly contested engagement they went into the rifle pits at Fort Hudson, and there remained until June 14, when the grand assault occurred, when his regiment lost one hundred and sixty men in fifteen minutes. They were compelled to retreat, and July 9 renewed the attack, when the enemy surrendered. They then went to Baton Rouge and spent the fall and winter of 1863-64 scouting as cavalry, and in February, 1864, about four hundred men re-enlisted after the expiration of their term of service, and were recruited as a full cavalry regiment. Our subject visited his home on a thirty-days' furlough at this time, and during the summer of 1864, and until March, 1865, they were at Highland Stockade and at Baton Rouge, and from the latter place went to New Orleans, and were at the capture of Forts Spanish, Blakesley and Mobile, and were then put in the cavalry service under General Greerson, when they started to join Sherman, who was on his march to the sea. They crossed Alabama and the south end of Florida, and after crossing the Chattahoochee river at Eufala, they met some of General Johnston's men, who informed them that he had surrendered to General Sherman, and they then went into camp, and after receiving orders returned to Montgomery, Alabama, where they were divided, and that portion of the brigade to which his regiment belonged sent to Columbus, Mississippi, through the Yazoo country to Vicksburg, and thence to Shreveport, Louisiana, by transport, where they were joined by the Third Michigan and Twelfth New York, and were ordered to San Antonio, Texas, leaving Shreveport July 9, 1865. After their arrival they made two expeditions into the mountains against the Indians, after which the brigade was divided; the regiment to which our subject belonged, the Fourth Wisconsin, went across the lower plains of western Texas, striking the Rio Grande at Fort McIntosh. They were the only cavalry regiment stationed on the river, and their work covered a river frontage of two hundred and fifty miles. Our subject assisted in taking prisoners to Brownsville, and he witnessed much of the warfare between General Maximilian and General Corteno at Matamoras, Mexico. He served his country five years, one month and a half, as a brave and loyal soldier, and was mustered out at Brownsville, Texas, May 19, 1866, and June 4 left for his home, where he arrived June 22.

During the summer after his return from the war, Mr. Van Meter resumed his profession as pilot on the river, and in the spring of 1867 began to learn the builder's art under Alexander Gamble, of Hudson, Wisconsin, for whom he worked five years. He has followed the work continuously since, and has constructed many mills and elevators in North Dakota. He resides on his farm, about two miles from the city of Ellendale, and rents his land. He came to Dickey county, North Dakota, April 15, 1882, and entered claim to his land, and returned to Wisconsin for a full set of tools with which to commence his work, and May 12, 1882, he took up the quarter-section where he now resides.

CHARLES H. MITCHELL, one of the brave defenders of the Union during the Civil war and the present popular city treasurer of Fargo, North Dakota, was born in Norwich, New York, June 8, 1842, and is the only son of Charles H. and Mary (Ryder) Mitchell, also natives of the Empire state, where the father was engaged in practice as a physician and surgeon throughout his active business life. He died in 1842. The grandfather, Henry Mitchell, was also a physician and surgeon of New York state and was a very prominent and influential citizen of his community. He was of English descent.

The subject of this sketch was reared and educated at Norwich and Oxford, New York, and after leaving school commenced the study of medicine, but in 1861, on the opening of the Rebellion, he laid aside all personal interests and enlisted in Company G, Sixty-first New York Volunteer Infantry, of which regiment General Miles was then lieutenant-colonel. Mr. Mitchell was in active service with that command for fourteen months, participating in the battles of Yorktown, Fair Oakes, the seven days' fight the battles of Malvern Hill, White Oaks and a number of smaller engagements, and was then discharged on account of disability in 1863, but subsequently he re-enlisted in Company I, One Hundred and Fourteenth New York Infantry, which was assigned to the Army of the Southwest. He was captured at Cain River Crossing, Louisiana, and held prisoner for six months, being exchanged in 1864. He was then in active service until the winter of 1865, when he was placed on duty in the reconstruction of the south. Fortunately he escaped unscathed, and when finally mustered out returned to his home in New York.

In 1867 Mr. Mitchell went to Chicago, where he remained three years, being engaged in the grocery trade a part of the time and the remainder as an employe in the postoffice. The following two years were passed at Minneapolis, and for seven years he conducted a hotel at Duluth, Minnesota. In 1878 he came to Fargo, North Dakota, and here he has since made his home, conducting a livery, sale and feed stable and also engaging in farming to some extent.

In 1874 was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Mitchell and Miss Eleanore A. Bennett, also a native of New York. He has always been identified with the Republican party, and is now a prominent member of the Grand Army post of Fargo. As one of its leading, progressive and public-spirited citizens, he has been called upon to serve as alderman of Fargo and in 1898 was elected city treasurer, which office he is now filling in a most commendable manner.

JOEL S. WEISER. One of the busiest, most energetic and most enterprising citizens of Valley City, North Dakota, is Joel S. Weiser, a prominent merchant and business man of that place. He bears in his veins some of the best blood of our early colonists, being a descendant of Conrad Weiser, of colonial fame, who played an important part in dealing with the British and the Indians in the days when our forefathers were striving to free themselves from the English yoke of oppression, and a man whose deeds were cherished by Washington and those high in authority.

Our subject was born in Berks county, Pennsylvania, August 31, 1834, and during early life attended school and assisted his father on the home farm until eighteen years of age, when he came west. After stopping for about thirty days at Danby Station, Du Page county, Illinois, he proceeded to St. Paul, Minnesota, and shortly afterward located in Shakopee, that state, where he made his home for fifteen years, following the trade of a mason.

On the 31st of September, 1864, Mr. Weiser enlisted in Company I, Ninth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and was at once ordered to Memphis, Tennessee, where the regiment was on camp duty until the middle of November, when they moved to Nashville, going through Kentucky on the way. After taking part in the two-days' engagement at Nashville, they followed Hood to Pulaski, Tennessee, and then turned to the right, passing through Clifton, on the Cumberland river, on their way to Mississippi. During the march they were engaged in fighting bushwhackers. On the morning of January 17, 1865, they arrived in Eastport, Mississippi, where they went into camp and remained three weeks, during which time they were constantly annoyed by bushwhackers. They next pushed forward to Vicksburg, where they camped five days and then proceeded to New Orleans, where they embarked on a steamer for Dauphin island. After remaining there for about four weeks they went up the Perdido river and on through the pines to Spanish Fort, to which they laid siege and captured April 9. On the 11th they marched towards Montgomery and Selma to destroy the rebel works, but on their arrival found they had been taken by Wilson's cavalry regiment. After camping at Selma three days they went to Marion, where the regiment remained until the close of the war. Returning home they were mustered out August 24, 1865.

Mr. Weiser continued his residence in Shakopee, Minnesota, until 1870, when he removed to St. Paul, and was there engaged in contracting for a period of four years. Later he lived on a farm in Washington county, Minnesota, twelve miles east of St. Paul, for three and a half years, during which time he followed farming, and in the fall of 1877 came to Valley City, where he has since made his home. He erected the second house in the village, known as the Northern Pacific House, which was burned to the ground April 25, 1898. In the spring of 1878 he embarked in general merchandising at this place, and is now the oldest merchant in years of continuous business in the city.

On the 10th of May, 1854, Mr. Weiser was united in marriage with Miss Louisa Clever, of Berks county, Pennsylvania, by whom he has had eleven children, six still living, one son and five daughters, three sons and two daughters being now deceased. The youngest daughter, Lillian, was the second white child born in Barnes county, and is now teaching in the public schools of Valley City. The son, John, is in the store with his father.

Mr. Weiser has been prominently identified with public affairs during his residence in this state. He was a member of the territorial council under Governor Church, also of the second assembly of the state legislature under Governor John Burke, now of Minnesota. During his career in Bismarck he was appointed watchman of the constitutional convention. He was the first treasurer of Barnes county, being first appointed by Governor Howard and later elected to that position for two terms, serving in all five years. He was also mayor of Valley City for four years, and alderman and member of the school board for years. He was given the honor of christening the city in which he now lives, and has borne a very active and prominent part in her up-building and prosperity. He attends the Methodist Episcopal church and is an honored member of the Grand Army post. In business affairs he has met with a well deserved success during his residence here, and he has also won the confidence and respect of his fellow citizens and of all with whom he has come in contact, either in public or private life.

OLE. N. HEM, register of deeds of Traill county, is among the popular and influential public officials of that county. He has resided in Hillsboro for the past four years, but previous to that time was a well-known and prosperous business man of Portland. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen of America, and Ancient Order of United Workmen. In political faith he is a Republican and attends the county and state conventions of his party and is firm in his convictions.

Our subject and an older sister were the only children born to Josiah and Rosella (Nichols) Gilmore, and our subject is now the only survivor of the family. The father was a general merchant in the town of Monroe, and he died when our subject was but one year of age, after which the mother and two children made their home with the maternal grandparents, and resided in Davenport, Iowa. After about two years they returned to a farm, and there our subject remained until about seventeen years of age. He then learned the manufacture of sand-paper in Melrose, Massachusetts, and when about twenty-five years of age learned telegraphy and was employed with the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific railroad. He joined a Northern Pacific surveying party in the spring of 1882, and traveled through Montana, and in the fall of that year began work for the company with which he is now engaged, at Portland, Traill county, North Dakota, and in the spring of 1883 was placed in charge of the yards at Hope. He is a successful business man, and has gained the confidence of his employers and associates. He is the owner of one half-section of land, and has gained a comfortable competence by earnest efforts.

The father of our subject, Elling Indergaard Jenne, was a farmer, and his grandfather, Jergan Eastman, was a blacksmith and farmer, while his grandfather, Ole Jenne, was a farmer. Knute Jenne, uncle of our subject, was a soldier in the Norwegian army. In a family of eight children, John E. Indergaard was the third in order of birth. He grew to manhood in his native land and attended the public schools until he was twenty years old. He then came to America, and landing in New York, proceeded west to Minnesota. There he worked for one year on a farm, and then came to Foster county in 1883, and took up government land. He put up a claim shanty, ten by ten feet, and started to improve his land. At that time he owned one team of oxen, five or six dollars in cash, and from these humble beginnings he has built up his present comfortable fortune. He worked for others a good portion of the first two years. In 1885 he raised a crop of wheat of only ten acres, and this yielded him seventeen bushels to the acre. He lived the life of a bachelor for eight years, and in that time had made substantial improvements on his land. He sold his farm in 1892, and located on section 10, township 147, range 66, where he still lives.

In 1894 Mr. Indergaard married Miss Bertha Rooldson, daughter of Sivert Rooldson, one of the earliest settlers of North Dakota. He is industrious and faithful in his efforts and his labors have brought good results. He makes his home on section 36 of Eagle township, and has been a resident of Richland county nearly twenty years.

Our subject was born in Norway, June 2, 1846. He came to America with his parents in June, 1863, and settled in Racine county, Wisconsin, on a farm. After about three years the family moved to Dakota county, Minnesota, where our subject stayed two years and then returned to Wisconsin and remained one year in Racine county, working at farm labor. He then went to Menomonie, Dunn county, Wisconsin, and worked at carpenter work for ten years, till the spring of 1880, when he removed to Richland county, North Dakota, and entered claim to land as a homestead on section 30, in Eagle township. He lived there about eight years, and then purchased the farm where he now resides on section 36, of Eagle township. Mr. Johnson takes an active interest in the welfare of his township and county, and has served as a member of the board of supervisors of Eagle township.

CHARLES A. DIGNESS. Among the better class of agriculturists of Traill county, the gentleman above named is entitled to a foremost rank. He has a pleasant home in section 26 of Garfield township, and has gained a high standing with his associates for his push and energy and active public spirit.

Our subject was born in Solor, Norway, in 1855, and was the second in a family of eleven children, born to Svenung and Maren (Bredesen) Digness. He remained in Norway until 1864 and then emigrated to America and settled at Decorah, Winnebuck county, Iowa, and there attended business college and gained a good knowledge of the English language and the principles of commercial life. In 1878 he went to Traill county, North Dakota, and entered claim to three hundred and twenty acres of government land. He now has one of the best improved farms of the locality and is thoroughly versed in the most approved methods of its operation. He has a comfortable residence erected in 1897, and a fine barn with sheds and shelter for over thirty head of stock and seventy tons of hay. The farm is well arranged in the way of improvements and he has made a success of general farming.

Our subject was married in 1883 to Mina Carolina Jensen. Three daughters and one son have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Digness, as follows: Selma, Anna, Cornelia and Agnar. Mr. Digness has served as a township officer since the organization of Garfield township, with the exception of three years, when he served as county commissioner, being chosen for the latter office in 1891 and served one term. He was a delegate to the state convention in 1890 on the Republican ticket, and was nominated presidential elector on the Fusion ticket in 1896. He is a leader in township and county affairs, and well merits his enviable reputation.

CHARLES M. LOVETT. An honorable position among the farmers of township 143, range 65, in Stutsman county, is willingly accorded this gentleman by his associates. He occupies one of the well-developed farms of the county, and is greatly respected in the community where he has spent the past eighteen years.

Our subject was born in Maine in 1845. The family has been in America since colonial times, and formerly lived in the vicinity of Salem. His father, Richard N. Lovett, was a ship carpenter and builder, and in later years followed farming to some extent. Israel Lovett, the great-grandfather of our subject, was a sea captain, as many of his forebears had been before him, and the grandfather of our subject, Robert Lovett, was a millwright. He was also a lieutenant in the war of 1812. Our subject's mother, Sarah V. Martin before her marriage, was a native of Maine, as were also her parents. She was raised in her native state, and her family was closely identified with the sea, two of her brothers being sea captains and her father a ship builder.

Mr. Lovett was the fourth in a family of six children, and was raised in Maine, spending the greater part of his time till early manhood on the farm. He was accorded a good education in the common and higher schools, attending Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Bates University. At the age of eighteen years he enlisted in the navy and was assigned to the United States ship Casco, a light draft torpedo ship, where he saw almost two years' service. He was at the battle of Fort Fisher, and was among the first to enter Richmond after its evacuation, going in small boats to clear the way. This little flotilla entered Richmond on the morning of the 3d of April, 1865, accompanied by Admiral Porter and Abraham Lincoln. The vessel on which he was doing duty was ordered to guard the Potomac when Booth was trying to escape. Our subject was discharged from the service in June, 1865, and returned to his home. He re-entered the school-room, but his eyesight and health soon began failing and he was forced to abandon college. He then spent a year and a half at home, traveled some, and in 1867 went to California, where he engaged in teaching and merchandising. He taught at Nevada City, Ophir, San Luis Obispo, Lincoln, Arroyo Grande and other places, was the Republican nominee for superintendent of schools of San Luis Obispo county in 1877, and altogether put in about sixteen years teaching in that state. He holds a teacher's life diploma of California, and was for many years a member of her examining boards.

His health further failing, he went to North Dakota in 1881, and took government land in Stuts-man county—a homestead, pre-emption and tree claim. Like many others, he put up a shanty and sod barn and started in with a team of oxen. His first crop of wheat was a poor yield, but oats averaged nearly ninety bushels per acre and were sold for eighty-five cents per bushel on the place. In 1882 he built a substantial house and other buildings on the homestead where he has since resided. He has now six hundred and forty acres of land with comfortable improvements; excellent water, a fine grove of trees, a herd of cattle, plenty of horses and farm machinery and is called a successful farmer.

Mr. Lovett feels he has been much hampered in the race of life by being so much of the time an invalid.

The subject of our sketch was married, in 1879, to Miss Emma C. Powell, a native of Oregon. Mrs. Lovett's father, Silas Powell, was an American of German descent and a farmer by occupation, and one of the pioneers of Oregon.

Her grandfather, Joab Powell, was an eminent Baptist divine.

Mr. and Mrs. Lovett have been the parents of the following children, the eldest of whom was born in California and the younger children in North Dakota: Homer S., Laura G., Edna J., Waldo M., Harriet P. and Earl.

Mr. Lovett is a gentleman who keeps abreast of the times in all matters of a public nature and is written considerably for the press upon educational and political topics and is well equipped on public questions. He is at present identified with the reform principles of the Populist party, but was a Republican prior to 1896, changing his views when he believed his party had abandoned its principles.

He is a pleasant gentleman to meet and highly esteemed in the community where he lives.

JAMES MCGURREN, one of the oldest settlers of Cass county, has prospered as an agriculturist and is now residing on his fine farm in section 20, Casselton township. Our subject is a native of Ireland, and was born in county Tyrone, November 1, 1836. His parents, John and Margaret (Murphy) McGurren, were natives of Ireland, and the father died there when our subject was but three years of age. The mother and stepfather came to America and died in this country.

James McGurren was reared in Ireland as a farmer until 1857, when he emigrated to the United States and settled in Herkimer county, New York, and remained there until 1861. He then enlisted in the Ninety-seventh New York Volunteer Infantry as a member of Company G, and served in that company and regiment four years, participating in the following battles: Second Bull Run, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Antietam, Wilderness, thirty days' siege of Petersburg, Weldon's Road, and in the latter engagement he was captured and held a prisoner six months in Libby, Salisbury, North Carolina, and Danville, Virginia. He was wounded at Gettysburg and Weldon's Road and in front of Petersburg, and soon after his release from prison was mustered out of the service, after a brave and loyal service. He was promoted three times while in active service, first to be sergeant, second, orderly or first sergeant, third, first lieutenant, and was commissioned captain, but did not muster in. He then returned to New York and lived there until taking up his residence in North Dakota, in 1878. He settled on the farm where he now resides in that year, taking one quarter-section of land as a homestead. He now owns an entire section, and is among the substantial men of his calling.

Our subject was married, in New York, in 1868, to Julia Drum, a native of that state. Eleven children, six sons and five daughters, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McGurran, all of whom are living. Mr. McGurran has served as school and town treasurer, and is active in local public affairs. He is a member of the Catholic church. In political sentiment he is a Democrat, and is strong in his convictions.

His parents, Henry and Charlotte (Peppard) Upham, were natives of Nova Scotia, where the father was superintendent of public instruction for fifteen consecutive years. Upham, the father of our present subject, came to Dakota and located at Acton on the Red river, then the only town in this region. He soon after went to Grafton and in the same year, 1881, started the "Walsh County Times." The next year he purchased the "News" and consolidated the "News" and the "Times," which he continued to publish until 1889.

The paper was Republican in politics and the organ of the party. That year he sold the paper to Mr. Bates and retired from active business. He died in 1889. Of his six sons and three daughters, four sons are now living. One son died in Manila, having gone there as a member of Company C, First North Dakota Volunteers.

In 1880 he was appointed register to deeds of Walsh county, being the first person to fill that office in the county. He served in this capacity six years, having been twice elected to the same position. In 1886 he served as a member of the lower house of the territorial legislature. At the age of twenty years our subject left his home, in 1866, and joined his brother-in-law, who was stationed on the Red river of the North at Georgetown, as agent of the Hudson Bay Company. The following fall our subject took a contract from the Hudson Bay Company to cut cord wood on the banks of the Red river, and in 1868 began flat-boating between Fort Abercrombie and Winnipeg, and his life during those days was full of adventures. WILLIAM S. MOORHOUSE, an honored veteran of the Civil war, and the present efficient and popular auditor of Burleigh county, North Dakota, whose home is in Bismarck, was born in Fayette county, Pennsylvania, January 26, 1840. His parents, Edward and Margaret (Lauson) Moorhouse, were both natives of Yorkshire, England, and came to the United States in 1829, locating in Fayette county, Pennsylvania, where the father died in 1854. By occupation he was a coal merchant. The mother is still living at the advanced age of ninety-one years and makes her home in Brownsville, Pennsylvania. In their family were seven sons and four daughters, all living in Pennsylvania with the exception of our subject.

In his native state William S. Moorhouse grew to manhood and acquired a good practical education. On leaving home in 1857 he went to Atchison county, Kansas, where he clerked in a hardware store for a time. He took an active part in the border warfare, and on the breaking out of the Rebellion he enlisted, in 1861, in Company B, Seventh Kansas Cavalry. He remained in the service for three years and six months and participated in the siege of Corinth, the Vicksburg campaign, the second battle of Corinth, the battles of Iuka and Tupelo, Mississippi, and a large number of smaller engagements. Fortunately he was never wounded nor taken prisoner, and at the close of the war, in 1865, was mustered out as captain of his company, to which rank he attained by meritorious service on field of battle.

Returning to Atchison Mr. Moorhouse resided there until appointed adjutant-general of Kansas in 1869, and while serving in that office during that and the following year he made his home in Topeka. Going back to Atchison, he continued to reside there until coming to Bismarck, North Dakota, in 1883. Here he engaged in the hardware trade for twelve years. In 1894 he was elected auditor of Burleigh county and is now serving his third term in that office. He was also on the board of county commissioners one term, and has been a member of the city council. His official duties have always been discharged with the utmost promptness and fidelity, winning the commendation of all concerned.

While a resident of Kansas, Mr. Moorhouse was married, in 1863, to Miss Annie Holthorn, a native of England, by whom he has one son, Frank E., now serving as deputy auditor. Socially Mr. Moorhouse is an honored member of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Knights of Pythias, and politically has always been identified with the Republican party. He served as chairman of the county committee for four years. He has always been found faithful to every trust reposed in him, so that his loyalty is above question, being manifest in days of peace as well as when he followed the old flag to victory on southern battle fields.

ALBERT SCHMIDT. A prominent position as a citizen and member of the farming community of Abercrombie township, Richland county, is held by the gentleman above named. He is the owner of a fine estate and makes his home on section 10.

Mr. Schmidt was born in Prussia, Germany, April 17, 1840. He was reared in his native land and was employed from the time he was fourteen years of age until he reached the age of twenty years as clerk in a mercantile establishment. He served in the Prussian army four years, and in the summer of 1864 set sail for America. He landed in New York in September, and after three months in that city went to Watertown, Wisconsin. He remained there a short time and then went to Columbus, Wisconsin, and after six months to La Crosse, and three months later to St. Cloud, Minnesota, where he remained three years employed in a saloon and billiard hall. He went to McCauleyville, Minnesota, in 1869, and engaged in the mercantile business there some ten years, when he went to Richland county, North Dakota, and settled on section 10 in Abercrombie township, since which time he has given his attention to farming. He now owns two hundred and forty-eight acres of land, and has met with success in his chosen calling.

Mr. Schmidt was married, in St. Cloud, Minnesota, September 30, 1869, to Miss Marie Tebing, who was born in Missouri, of German parentage. Mrs. Schmidt died in McCauleyville, Minnesota, in April, 1875, leaving four children, as follows: Mary, Anna, Herman and Louisa. Mr. Schmidt married Miss Magdalene Bauer, in McCauleyville, Minnesota, May 9, 1876. Ten children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Schmidt, as follows: August, Otto, Bertha, Carl, Lottie, Leo, Lena, Paul, Olga and Albert. JACOB A. SORUM, county sheriff of Traill county, is extensively interested in farming in that county, and is one of the substantial and public-spirited citizens of the state. He has acquired his property and high reputation by his earnest efforts, and is a man of much energy and a capacity for well-directed labor. He has resided in Hillsboro but a short time, but has become well known and is highly respected by all. His farm consists of four hundred and sixty acres of choice land, upon which he has placed modern buildings, and it is a home of luxury and the farm yields abundantly and furnishes a comfortable competence.

Our subject was born in Allamakee county, Iowa, April 13, 1858, and was the eldest in a family of twelve children, born to Andrew and Bertha (Torgerson) Sorum, both of whom are living and make their home in Eldorado township, Traill county, North Dakota.

Our subject, with his father and sister, went to Dakota from the home farm in Iowa in the fall of 1879, and both father and son entered claim to land in Traill county, each in section 30. A log house was erected on each farm, and the following spring the remaining members of the family joined them in the new home. They broke the land and engaged in wheat raising during the first season, and hauled their grain to Fargo, forty miles distant, the nearest railroad point. Mr. Sorum had but forty dollars on his arrival in Dakota, and the strictest economy and hard work were necessary to get a start on the pioneer farm. He put a small addition to the small log house and this was his home until 1896, when it was supplanted by a fine frame residence, and a 40x60-foot barn was erected in 1890, giving the place an appearance of thrift and care in its development. Our subject has added to his real estate as circumstances permitted, and now owns four hundred and sixty acres of land, which forms one of the best farms in the county. An artesian well furnishes an abundance of water, and also gives a supply of natural gas, which as yet can not be utilized.

Our subject was married, in 1881, to Miss Rindena Ekdahl, a native of Norway. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Sorum, as follows: Bertha, now Mrs. A. Dahl; John, now attending Agricultural College at Fargo; Turine; Julius; Carl and Albert. The family reside in the county jail building, which is one of the most substantial and imposing structures of the county, built of stone to a height of about twelve feet and the upper part of pressed brick. Mr. Sorum was elected county sheriff in 1898, and during the summer of 1899 removed to Hillsboro. He served on the township board in his township three years, and during two of the time was chairman of that body. He is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America and also the United Lutheran church. Politically he is a Republican, and is a firm supporter of party principles, but does not seek public preferment.

MILLARD F. WASHBURN, one of the earliest pioneer settlers of Griggs county, has resided in the township which bears his name for the past twenty years, and has been intimately connected with the history and development of that region. He has a fine farm in section 20, in which section he first settled, and is now enjoying the fruits of his labors in North Dakota.

Millard F. Washburn, at the age of seven years, went with his parents to Red Wing, Minnesota, where he finished his education and grew to manhood. He was engaged with the American Express Company five years, and with the Red Wing Milling Company three years, and in the spring of 1881 went to Griggs county, North Dakota. He filed claim to land with the government surveyors, who were then working in the county, and he has lived on the original claim continuously since. He has met with success as a farmer and now enjoys a good income.

Our subject was married, near Cooperstown, in 1883, to Miss Maria Hussel, a native of St. Clair county, Michigan. Mrs. Washburn was born November 10, 1855, and was a daughter of Andrew and Maria (Klingler) Hussel, who followed farming in Michigan. Her father was a soldier in a Michigan regiment during the Civil war, and served two years. Mrs. Washburn was one of the seven children born to this worthy couple. Her father was a successful farmer, and is now living in retirement in St. Clair county, Michigan. Mr. Washburn is chairman of the board of supervisors of Washburn township, and has always taken an active part in local affairs, and the township of Washburn was named in honor of his services. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

His father was born in England, where he lived until 1853, when he emigrated to Canada. He was a farmer by occupation and was married in his native country. Thirteen children were born to this worthy couple, ten sons and three daughters, all of whom are living with the exception of one son, James, who was drowned near the old home in a mill race, when twenty-one years of age. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Masonic fraternity, and he and family are communicants of the Methodist Episcopal church at La Moure.

ALEXANDER STERN. It is astonishing to witness the success of young men who have emigrated to America without capital and from a position of comparative obscurity have worked their way upward to a position of prominence. The readiness with which they adapt themselves to circumstances and take advantage of the opportunities offered brings to them success and wins them a place among the leading men of the community in which they reside. A worthy representative of this class is Mr. Stern, now president of the city council of Fargo, North Dakota, and one of the most prominent business men of the place.

He was born in Giessen, Germany, June 7, 1857, a son of Aaron and Emily (Meyer) Stern, who spent their entire lives in that country, where the father carried on operations as a farmer and stock raiser. In their family were three sons and one daughter, of whom two are now residents of Fargo, and one son is deceased. Our subject was reared and educated in his native land, and in 1871 came to America, landing in New York on the 17th of August. He proceeded at once to Chicago, and from there went to Bloomington, Illinois., where he was employed as clerk for some time and in 1878 embarked in business on his own account, remaining in that city until 1882.

During that year Mr. Stern came to Fargo, North Dakota, and opened a clothing store on the corner of Broadway and Second avenue, where he continued in business until 1885, when he erected his present store building on Broadway. In 1892 he built two other business blocks, which were destroyed in the fire of the following year, but with characteristic energy he at once rebuilt, commencing work upon the place two days after the fire. He now has the best business blocks in the city and is erecting two others, which will be still finer. He has become interested in a number of different enterprises and is now vice-president of the Fargo Packing Company, which he founded, is president of the Fargo Plumbing Company, and director of the Merchants' State Bank.

On the 5th of July, 1885, Mr. Stern married Miss Bertha Kauffman, who was born in Arora mining camp in the mountains of Nevada, and they have become the parents of three sons, namely: William M., Samuel S. and Edward A. Fraternally Mr. Stern is a thirty-second-degree Mason, a member of the Mystic Shrine, and also belongs to the Foresters. Politically he is now a Republican, but formerly affiliated with the Democratic party until the campaign of 1896, when he withdrew from their ranks, not being a free silver advocate. He has been a member of the board of directors of the Agricultural College for the past five years, being first appointed by Governor Allen and re-appointed by Governor Foucher. He is also serving his second term in the city council and is now president of the same. He is quite prominent both in political and business circles and the high position which he occupies is due entirely to his own well-directed efforts. On landing in the United States, he had but seventeen dollars in gold, which he exchanged for twenty-two dollars in paper money, and with this capital he began life in the new world. He has steadily prospered in his undertakings and is now one of the wealthiest men of Fargo.

GEORGE B. VALLANDIGHAM, a leading journalist of Barnes county and the present publisher of the "North Dakota Patriot," was born in New Lisbon, Ohio, October 7, 1843, a son of Dr. George S. and Mary A. (Hamilton) Vallandigham, also natives of New Lisbon. The father died in 1873, but the mother is still living and now makes her home in Los Angeles, California.

Our subject attended the schools of his native village, and at the age of fifteen entered the office of the Ohio Patriot, at New Lisbon, now the third oldest paper in the state, having been established in 1808. He continued to follow the printer's trade until just before the Civil war. In the spring of 1861 he went to Gambier, Ohio, to take a preparatory course, intending to enter Kenyon College, but in October, 1862, he laid aside all personal interests and entered the service of his country as a member of the Eighty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, which regiment had been captured at Harper's Ferry and was paroled at the time he enlisted.

On the 1st of December, 1862, it was merged into the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, with which Mr. Vallandigham served until the spring of 1864. After the battle of Resaca he was taken ill and sent north, and in the fall of 1864 was placed on detached duty under General Noyes at Camp Dennison, Ohio, where he remained until the latter part of December. Going to Chicago he joined the Eighth Regiment, Veteran Reserve Corps, and remained there during the winter. In the spring of 1865 he was placed on detached duty at the United States general hospital as clerk and remained there until honorably discharged, July 21. During his service in the south in 1863 he was detailed to take possession of a printing office in the town of Franklin, Tennessee, and assisted in publishing an army newspaper entitled the "Federal Knapsack," which he carried on for some months. He participated in the battles of Franklin, Tennessee, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Rocky Face and Resaca, and a number of skirmishes and was always found at his post of duty.

Returning to his home in New Lisbon, Ohio, at the close of the war, Mr. Vallandigham remained there until the fall of 1866, when he again entered college at Gambier. On the 25th of December, 1867, he married Miss Maria A. Patterson, a native of New York, and the following year they located in Albany, that state. He continued to work at his trade in different cities in New York until the fall of 1873, when he returned to New Lisbon and purchased a half interest in the Ohio Patriot. Two years later he moved to Cincinnati, Ohio, and secured a position with the Methodist Book Concern, with which he was connected until June, 1877. Three children had been born to them, two of whom are now living. His wife died on the first of July of that year. In June, 1878, he went west to Minnesota, where he followed his trade until 1879, and then came to Valley City, North Dakota, where he established the "Northern Pacific Times" for Dr. S. B. Coe. In 1884 he started the "North Dakota Democrat," then a Democratic paper, the name of which he changed to the "North Dakota Patriot" in 1891. This journal he still successfully carries on. In 1895 he changed his politics and that of his paper to Republican. He has been an important factor in public affairs, and shortly after coming to this state was appointed deputy clerk of the court and probate judge in 1879, and in 1886 was appointed deputy collector of internal revenue. Socially, he is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Knights of Honor and the Knights of the Macca-bees.

For his second wife Mr. Vallandigham wedded Miss Mary K. Gordon, of Humeston, Iowa, by whom he has two children.

He resided on the home farm in Illinois until after attaining his majority, when he went to Kansas, and later took land in Buffalo county, Nebraska, where he resided two and a half years. He then returned to LaSalle county, Illinois, and engaged in farming two years, and in November, 1882, went to Casselton, Dakota. He went to Hope, North Dakota, in the spring of 1883, and filed claim to land in Hope township, Steele county. His wife soon joined him in the new home, and he followed farming on the land until 1888, but did not meet with success, and then established a draying business in Hope, and was thus employed until 1896, when he accepted the local agency for the C. N. Nelson Lumber Company at Hope. He continued thus until the spring of 1899 and then established his present business, in which line he has prospered. He owns two hundred and forty acres of land four miles west of the city of Hope, and he rents the land to others. He does an extensive business in the handling of coal and wood, and has a six-horse-power gasoline engine attached to a circular saw for the preparing of the wood for fuel.

Rich, deceased, has preceded him but a short time. He is now the owner of a fine estate in Eagle township, and makes his home on section 20.

Our subject was born in Tioga county, Pennsylvania, April 16, 1843. When he was but one year of age he moved with his parents to New York, and when he was twelve years of age the family returned to Tioga county, Pennsylvania, where our subject remained until he enlisted, in August, 1861, in Company A, One Hundred and Thirty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and served two years and eight months. He then re-enlisted in the Second New York Veteran Cavalry and served until the close of the war. After the service he returned to Tioga county and engaged chiefly in lumbering until 1867, when he went to Minnesota and engaged two years in farming in Faribault county, after which he removed to Dakota territory and took a squatter's claim to the land which is now his home farm, where he has since continued to reside. Our subject attended school in his native village until twelve years of age, when he entered the Academy at Belle Mills, now Bellwood, and at the age of seventeen completed his schooling. He then accepted a position in the bank of Tyrone, and from that institution went into the employ of R. B. After a short service in that department he was assigned as a correspondent in the engine department and was clerk of the principal assistant of the department. He next entered the civil engineer's office, remaining there until he went to St. Paul, Minnesota, in the fall of 1881. He there entered the land office of the Graves & Vinton Company, and remained in their employ six months, during which time he formed a colony and accompanied them to Keystone, Dickey county, located two and a half miles east of Monango. He platted the village, purchasing the land from the government prior to it being put on the market. He was the first postmaster, merchant and banker of Keystone, and continued in business there until 1888, and was also engaged extensively in the real estate business. He sold his mercantile business to D. P. The grandfather of our subject, Judge Lamb, resided in Cattarangus county, New York.

After the death of our subject's father the family was wholly dependent on the support of the mother, and our subject at the early age of eight years began aiding in their support by herding cattle, at which work he was engaged until about twelve years of age, when the mother remarried and our subject was given some educational advantages. From his boyhood he made his way in the world and finally adopted farm work. He went to Cass county, North Dakota, and worked one year, meanwhile locating land near Fort Ransom, in Ransom county. He had no stock and little means and built a sod shanty and cared for stock during the winter of 1883-1884, and the following spring secured an ox-team and began the improvement of his farm. He went to La Moure county when Dakota was but a territory and he had but limited means with which to advance his interests, but has steadily gained as regards financial strength and is in more than comfortable circumstances at the present. He was one of the pioneers of Stutsman county and met with many discouragements, but during his life conducted a well-improved farm, gained a comfortable competence and an enviable reputation.

Our subject was born in Devonshire, England, in 1825. His father, Francis Squire, was a farmer by occupation and the Squire family for over one hundred years had been in possession of the farm where our subject was born and raised. Mr. Squire's mother's death occurred during his infancy. He remained in his native land until about thirty years of age, when he came to America and located in Canada, after which, in the fall of 1880, he went to North Dakota. He took government land as a pre-emption and homestead. He had no means with which to conduct his farm work, and he spent the first summer and two winters in Jamestown and was enabled to earn good wages, as he was handy at all kinds of employment. He started farming in the spring of 1882 and his first barn was a dugout. He moved onto his homestead and erected a good residence and although his first crop was sown by hand, he reaped a bountiful harvest and was enabled to further his work. The farm now comprises six hundred and sixty acres, more than half of which is under cultivation, and in the fall of 1899 he marketed two thousand bushels of grain and the year previous shipped five thousand bushels of wheat. Mr. Hunger was engaged in agricultural pursuits many years in that region and in every business venture has met with unbounded success. He has acquired a good property and an enviable reputation. On another page is presented a portrait of Mr. Hunger in connection with this sketch.

Our subject was born in Rosenaw, Province Schlerien, Germany, March 13, 1849. He was reared in his native country and remained there until 1878, when he emigrated to America. After residing in St. Paul, Minnesota, for a few months, he went to Dakota territory in February, 1879, and entered claim to a homestead farm in Bedford township, Richland county, where he engaged in farming nine years. He then removed to Hankinson and engaged in the mercantile business, at which occupation he has been engaged since. His store is equipped with a complete line of general merchandise and he enjoys an extensive patronage. He also possesses twenty-seven hundred and twenty acres of land in Richland county and has acquired a fortune since taking up his residence in Dakota.

Our subject was married, in his native land, to Anna Hochhausler. Mrs. Hunger died in Hankinson, North Dakota, June 28, 1892, leaving one son, Fred O., who is now in business with his father. Mr. Hunger was married to Miss Anna Jansen, a native of Norway, in Fergus Falls, Minnesota. He has served as a member of the Hankinson school board for the past eight years and for five years has been a member of the village board of Hankinson. He is an earnest worker for the better interests of his adopted land and is one of the wide-awake and highly esteemed men of that community. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity.

DANIEL S. NEIMAN is one of the representative general farmers of Foster county, and has been a conspicuous figure in the development and extension of the great agricultural interests of that region. He has passed through pioneer experiences and has gained a comfortable competence and a well-improved estate by dint of faithful and persistent efforts and is highly esteemed as a public-spirited citizen.

Our subject was born in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in 1850. His father, Martin Neiman, was of German descent and was a hotelkeeper in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and Indianapolis, Indiana. He served in the United States army as a scout. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of Laha Stair and was a native of Pennsylvania.

Our subject was the fourth in a family of five children and was raised in Indianapolis, where his parents located when he was but one year old. When he was ten years of age the father died, and the children were early put to work. Mr. Neiman received a common-school education and also attended a business college and at the age of twenty years began railroad work as a fireman and later was promoted to engineer on the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad and followed railroad work seven years. He went to North Dakota October 9, 1882, and settled in Fargo, where he worked as engineer and in the fall of 1883 entered claim to the northeast quarter of section 26, township 146, range 65, and moved his family to the farm. He remained in Fargo two years afterward and was employed in the electric light plant and his brother-in-law had charge of the farm work. A 12x12-foot shanty had been erected on the farm and their nearest neighbor was four miles distant and there were but three houses between the farm and Carrington. Our subject assumed the management of the farm in 1885, since which time he has devoted his attention to that alone. The first two years did not meet the expenses of the farm, but he has since engaged successfully in grain raising. He now operates eleven hundred acres of land and cultivates about seven hundred acres annually and he contemplates breaking the balance of the land for crops. He purchased a threshing outfit in the fall of 1891 and has operated the machine every season since with remarkable success and now has a twenty-horsepower engine. He has all the necessary machinery and a thoroughly improved farm. He and his family were among the earliest settlers of Rose Hill township and during the severe storms have burned twisted hay for fuel and ground wheat in a coffee-mill. The first church built in the neighborhood was the Congregational church, erected in 1895. Prior to that time services were held in different houses in the neighborhood and the first meeting was conducted by Rev. C. M. C. Burns, a Methodist divine, and was held in a sod shanty on section 26, township 146, range 65, the home of A. T. Railsback. Many of the pioneer settlers of that region have moved from their farms and Mr. Neiman is one of the few to remain. He was one of the first school officers in the township and all of the other officers of the board at that time have gone away.

Our subject was married, at the age of twenty-one, to Miss Eliza J. Railsback, who was born and raised in Iowa. Mrs. Neiman's father, Enoc Railsback, was of German descent and was a farmer in Indiana. Mr. and Mrs. Neiman are the parents of one child, Clieve R., born in 1883, and also have an adopted daughter, Louisa, who was born July 4, 1891. Mr. Neiman is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically, he is a Republican and is firm in his convictions. He takes an active part in local affairs and has held numerous school offices in his township.

JENS PEDERSON, who is well known as a prosperous merchant of Milnor, Sargent county, North Dakota, is also vice-president of the Farmers' Mill & Grain Company. He is a gentleman of excellent business capacities and has met with unbounded success in every enterprise in which he has embarked. He has gained a goodly fortune and a host of friends in that region.

Our subject was born in Denmark, June 19, 1855. He was reared in his native land and received a common-school education and learned the trade of a blacksmith and carriagemaker. He remained in Denmark until 1873, when he came to America and went direct to Minneapolis, Minnesota, where he followed his trade for five years and then went to Franklin, Renville county, Minnesota, and followed his trade and also engaged in farming. He left Minnesota in 1882 and went to Richland county, North Dakota, where he remained until the spring of 1883, and then located in Sargent county, following his trade in Milnor until 1892. He then engaged in the farm machinery and implement business and in 1895 added general merchandise, which business he has since conducted in through his implement trade. He enjoys an extensive patronage and is one of the leading merchants of the village.

Our subject was married, in Renville county, Minnesota, August 20, 1878, to Miss Mary Hoff, a native of Norway. Mr. Pederson was one of the first county commissioners of Sargent county and served two years. He was appointed by Governor Shortridge on the board of agriculture of the state and served as a member of the board two years. He takes an active part in all local affairs of a public nature, and has held the various township offices in Milnor township.

MARTIN L. SHANKS, M. D. The medical profession is ably represented by Dr. Shanks, of Casselton, Cass county, North Dakota. He is one of the pioneer physicians and surgeons of North Dakota and his life and labors there have been crowned with success. He is known throughout the Northwest as a skilled practitioner and one who progresses as time moves all things forward and he enjoys an ever increasing patronage and the confidence of the people among whom he labors.

Our subject was born in Port Washington, Tuscarawas county, Ohio, November 1, 1848, and was of a family of eleven children, five sons and six daughters, born to David and Catherine (Barrick) Shanks, natives, respectively, of Ohio and Pennsylvania. His father was a farmer by occupation and passed his career in Ohio, most of the time in Huron county. He died in 1885 and the mother in 1888. The grandfather of our subject, James Shanks, was a native of Scotland and came to the United States about 1792, and died in Ohio. He was a tanner by trade and conducted a tannery at Mansfield, Ohio.

Our subject was reared and educated in his native state, graduating from there in 1870. He enlisted, in July, 1863, in Company M, First Ohio Heavy Artillery, and served until August 3, 1865, and participated in the following engagements: Strawberry Plains, Tennessee; raid up the Tennessee river; London, Tennessee, with Hood, and following that with Morgan cavalry near there; Salisbury, North Carolina; French Broad river, and finally at Nashville, where he was held as reserve. After his return from the war he completed his studies and then, in 1870, began teaching school and also read medicine and clerked in a drug store at Clyde, Ohio. He attended lectures at Columbus, Ohio, Medical College, in 1875-1876 and graduated from that institution in 1882. He had practiced some since 1877 at New Castle, Pennsylvania, and in 1886 entered Rush Medical College and attended one course of lectures and in 1891 attended a course at the College of Physicians & Surgeons of New York. He made an extended tour through Europe in 1892, in the interests of his profession and visited the leading hospitals of England, Germany, France, Italy and Switzerland. He went to Yankton, North Dakota, in 1878, and after a short stay located at Casselton, in January, 1878, where he has since resided and has continued in the practice of medicine and surgery. When he located there he was the only physician between Fargo and Bismarck and he experienced many hardships during the early days of that region. He has followed the modern methods of his profession by attending lectures every two years in various parts of the country, is progressive in his work and conscientious as a practitioner. He is devoted entirely to his work and in 1899 established a hospital containing fourteen beds at Casselton. He is the owner of one of the finest business blocks in the city of Casselton and enjoys prosperity.

Our subject was married, in November, 1879, to Miss Laura A. Lean, a native of England. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Shanks, as follows: Markwell, Clytie and Vallow. Mr. Shanks is prominent in secret society circles and holds membership in the Masonic fraternity, Knights Templar and Mystic Shrine; Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Knights of Pythias; Fraternal Union, and Ancient Order of Foresters. He has been county physician for the past two years for the district in which he resides and is one of the best known men of the state. He is a member of the Cass County Medical Society and the State Medical Society. Politically, he is a Republican, but does not take an active part in political affairs.

GEORGE C. GATES is a well-known agriculturist of Richland county, North Dakota, whose farm is pleasantly located on section 21, Centre township. A gentleman of integrity and sterling worth, he has pursued the even tenor of his way as an honest man and good citizen and commands the respect of all who know him.

Mr. Gates was born in Montgomery, Franklin county, Vermont, October 5, 1859, and is a son of Darius and Julia (Sykes) Gates, also natives of the Green Mountain state. At the age of four years he accompanied his parents on their removal to Wisconsin and in St. Croix county they passed their remaining days, the father dying at the age of sixty-nine years, the mother at the age of fifty-two.

Our subject was reared upon a farm in St. Croix county, Wisconsin, and early became familiar with all the duties which fall to the lot of the agriculturist, while his literary education was obtained in the common schools of the county. He continued his residence there until the fall of 1886, when he came to Richland county, North Dakota, and bought a half-section of land on sections 21 and 22 Centre township. To the improvement and cultivation of his place he has since devoted his energies and has added to the original purchase a tract of two hundred and forty acres. He has erected good buildings upon the farm and placed the land under a high state of cultivation. He takes an active interest in public affairs and has filled the offices of township clerk and school clerk in Centre township. He has a comfortable home over which his sister, Laura, presides. Religiously, he is a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church and he is highly respected and esteemed by all with whom he comes in contact.

WILLIAM N. CAMPBELL, a leading business man and representative citizen of Valley City, North Dakota, is now successfully engaged in journalistic work in connection with David W. Clark, as proprietors of the "People's Advocate," the only paper published in the interest of the People's party in that city. It is a bright, newsy sheet and under its present able management is meeting with well-deserved success. Mr. Campbell is also engaged in the insurance and real estate business and is now president of the Alliance Hail Insurance Company.

He was born in Addison county, Vermont, December 16, 1854, and is a son of Charles and Electa (Newton) Campbell, who are at present living at Watertown, South Dakota. The father was born in Vermont in 1816 and prior to the Mexican war was a soldier in the regular army, while during the Civil war he was captain of a company in the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, under the command of Colonel Hege.

At the age of five years William N. Campbell went with his parents to Waupun, Wisconsin, where he was reared upon the home farm, which he assisted his father in operating during his boyhood and youth. His early education, acquired in the district schools near his home, was supplemented by a course at the Oshkosh Normal School, Wisconsin. He came to North Dakota in the spring of 1882, when it was still a territory, and two years later he took up a quarter-section of land in the southwest part of Barnes county, on which he made his home, engaging in general farming, until coming to Valley City in the spring of 1892. Since then he has given his attention to the insurance and real-estate business, and in 1896 also became interested in newspaper work. Upright and reliable in all things, the prosperity that has attended his efforts is certainly justly merited and he has gained a host of warm friends throughout his adopted county.

On the 8th of February, 1885, Mr. Campbell was united in marriage with Miss Lillie J. McCune, a native of Waupun, Wisconsin, and a daughter of John and Marcie McCune. Three children bless this union, one son and two daughters, namely: Mabel, Charlie and Luella.

GEORGE A. CARPENTER, M. D., one of the most successful and prominent physicians and surgeons of Fargo, North Dakota, is a native of Minnesota, born in Monticello, Wright county, February 7, 1863, and is a son of George W. and Mary (Williams) Carpenter, both natives of New York. In 1858 they removed to Minnesota, where the father engaged in merchandising for many years and also served as probate judge of Wright county for some years. In 1889 he brought his family to Fargo, where the parents now reside.

In the county of his nativity, Dr. Carpenter was reared and educated and in 1882 he entered the Minnesota Hospital College, which later became the State University, and was graduated from that institution in 1885 with the degree of M. D. During the same year he opened an office at Marine Mills, Washington county, Minnesota, and continued there until the fall of 1889, when he came to Fargo and has since engaged in the general practice of medicine and surgery. He is a progressive member of his profession—one who keeps abreast of the latest discoveries and theories by his perusal of medical journals. His skill and ability are attested by the liberal patronage he enjoys and he is ranked as one of the leading physicians of this section of the state.

Dr. Carpenter was married, in 1886, to Miss Sadie Clark, also a native of Minnesota, and to them have been born two daughters, Irene A. and Minnie L. In political sentiment the Doctor is an ardent Republican and for two terms he has served as health officer of Fargo and as county physician for five years. He was a member of the board of pension examiners for five years; is now special examiner for pensions, and examining surgeon for the United States recruiting station at Fargo. He is a member of the Cass County and North Dakota Medical Societies, the American Medical Association, the Masonic fraternity, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Foresters and the National Union. For the past five years he has been grand medical examiner of the state for the Workmen. He spent some time in 1890 in New York hospitals and gives his whole time and attention to his profession. He has won a foremost place in the ranks of the medical fraternity in the Northwest and merits and receives a liberal patronage.

THOMAS A. CURTIS, state's attorney of Ransom county, residing in the city of Lisbon, is a man of estimable character and has gained the confidence of those among whom he has chosen his home. He has become a leader in his profession by dint of his own efforts and well merits his success.

Our subject was born at Magnolia Corners, Rock county, Wisconsin, January 27, 1862, and was the youngest in a family of four children, born to Israel and Elizabeth (Fitzpatrick) Curtis, both of whom are deceased. The mother was of Irish birth and the father was of colonial English descent. Three of five sons of an English lord of the Curtis family were kidnapped and brought to America, where they were sold or bound out to pay for passage and our subject is a descendant of the son who chanced to settle in New York. Soon after the birth of our subject his father went to the Civil war and the family removed to Janesville, Wisconsin, and the father never returned from the service.

A common-school education was afforded our subject and he worked in a shoe factory until sixteen years of age, when he became a painter, which occupation he followed four years, during which time he read law, under the guidance of J. B. Cassoday, who is now chief justice of Wisconsin. Mr. Curtis went to Marshalltown, Iowa, in 1881, where he worked in a barbed-wire factory one year and then went to Minneapolis, and from thence to Fargo, Dakota. He arrived at Lisbon, Ransom county, May 7, 1883, and followed lathing and carpenter work, in the meantime pursuing his law studies. He entered a law office at Lisbon in the fall of 1884, and March 23, 1885, was admitted to the bar. He then entered the real estate office of Judge Allen and was also city clerk and October 1, 1886, began work with C. D. Austin and the following April established an office for himself. He was appointed city attorney in 1890 and was elected to his present office in 1898. He defended the only murder case ever tried in the county and secured acquittal for his client, in state vs. Frank Welch.

Our subject was married, in 1886, to Miss Phebe Forward. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, as follows: Loren B., Walter G., Rollo A., Elsie S. and Alice L. Mr. Curtis was elected mayor of Lisbon in 1892 and served two years, the honor being conferred upon him through the efforts of the G. A. R. He was a candidate for state's attorney in 1892 and county judge in 1894 and 1896, but was defeated and in 1898 was elected state's attorney by a large majority. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Modern Woodmen of America and Knights of Maccabees. He is a young man of prominence and has a bright future in North Dakota.

EZRA B. EDDY, deceased, whose portrait appears on another page, was numbered among the honored pioneers of Fargo and was the founder of the First National Bank, of which he was president many years. He was prominently identified with the development and upbuilding of his adopted city and was one of its most public-spirited and progressive residents. As the years passed he faithfully performed his duties of citizenship and his interest in the welfare and progress of the community never abated. Becoming widely and favorably known he made many friends and his death was a great loss to the city.

Mr. Eddy was born in Ohio December 14, 1829, a son of Rev. Ira Eddy, a Methodist Episcopal minister, who was engaged in preaching in that state for half a century. He had two sons. Reared in Ohio, our subject was educated in its common schools and during his youth learned the shoemaker's trade, which he followed for a few years. In 1855 he removed to Wabasha county, Minnesota, and located on the present site of Plainview, where he took up government land. He erected the first building on what was called Greenwood prairie and there followed farming until the breaking out of the Civil war, when he enlisted as first lieutenant in Company G, Third Minnesota Volunteer Infantry. After two years of arduous service he was forced to resign on account of failing health and return home. He continued his farming operations in Minnesota until 1865, when he met with misfortune in the loss of a hand in a threshing machine. He then engaged in the hardware business at Plainview and later in the insurance and banking business, founding the Plainview Bank, the first bank of Wabasha county.

Disposing of his interests there in 1879, Mr. Eddy came to Fargo, North Dakota, where he had started the First National Bank the year previous. He served as its first president and continued to fill that position up to the time of his death in 1885. In company with his son, E. C. Eddy, he also founded the Fargo Loan Agency under the firm name of E. B. Eddy & Son, and was also interested in that organization until his death. In 1879 he platted an addition to the city, known as the Eddy & Fuller outlots and he assisted in starting nearly every enterprise in Fargo. He lost a great deal of property in his endeavor to build up the city, but was instrumental in making it one of the most thriving cities of the Northwest. He took an active interest in political affairs, but never sought public office. His support was never withheld from any enterprise calculated to prove of public good; he was the founder of the Fargo Library Association, and one of the organizers of the Methodist Episcopal church, to which he gave its first organ. Socially he was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and was a man of prominence and influence in his community.

In Ohio Mr. Eddy was married, in 1850, to Miss Jane B. Wilson, a native of Pennsylvania, and to them were born five children, three sons and two daughters, namely: William, who died in infancy; Ernest C., Inez L., Ira T. and Ethelda J., all living. The sons are both residents of Fargo.

ERNEST C. EDDY, the older of the two sons now living, was born in Minnesota June 24, 1856, and was reared and educated in that state and at Racine, Wisconsin. During the residence of the family in Minnesota he was in the employ of his father and on the organization of the First National Bank, of Fargo, North Dakota, was chosen its first cashier, which position he filled until 1881, when he was made vice-president. He served in that capacity until January, 1886, when he was chosen president, but the following year disposed of his interest in the business and opened a private bank, known as the Banking House of E. C. Eddy & Company, with which he was connected until the bank was destroyed by fire in 1893. Since then he has given his attention principally to farming and stock raising, though he still continues to engage in the real estate and collection business. He is a man of excellent business ability, energetic and progressive, and in his undertakings has been remarkably successful. He commands the respect and confidence of all with whom he comes in contact, either in business or social life, and is a prominent member of the Masonic order, being eminent commander of Auvergne Commandery, No. 2, K. T.

In 1877 Mr. Eddy was united in marriage with Miss Ida E. Hopson, who was born in Minnesota, and they have become the parents of the following children: Wayne G., Carrie J., Hattie Gean, Ray W., Ezra B., Paul H. and William Tubbs. A portrait of Ernest C. Eddy is presented in connection with this sketch.

FRANK A. LITTLE, a leading farmer of Centre township, Richland county, North Dakota, has his home on section 15. He evidences by the manner in which he carries on his business that he thoroughly understands the vocation in which he is engaged, and that success is attending his efforts towards acquiring a competence. Neatness and order prevail upon his place, which is managed, with regard to its cultivation, in a manner which reflects great credit upon the owner.

Mr. Little was born in Lake county, Illinois, November 11, 1855, and is the fourth in order of birth in a family of eleven children, seven sons and four daughters, whose parents were Asa and Deborah Ann (Palmer) Little. The father, who was a native of New York, died in Lake county, Illinois, when nearly seventy years of age, and the mother died in the same place when over sixty.

In the county of his nativity our subject grew to manhood, and there he was married, November 6, 1876, to Miss Jessie Colls. She was also born in Lake county, Illinois, August 23, 1856, and was a daughter of Professor R. K. and Delia (Gage) Colls, who died in that county, the former at the age of sixty-seven years, the latter at the age of forty-two. In their family were nine children, of whom Mrs. Little is the sixth in order of birth. Our subject and his wife continued their residence in Lake county until the spring of 1885, when they came to North Dakota and settled in Centre township, Richland county, where he has since carried on operations as a general farmer with the exception of three years spent in his native county. He now owns one hundred and seventy acres of well improved and highly cultivated land.

GRAFTON NATIONAL BANK, of Grafton, North Dakota, was organized January 1, 1884, and was the successor of the Bank of Grafton, which was organized in 1881, with the following officers: W. W. Hartwell, of New York, president; F. R. Fulton, vice-president and D. C. Moore, cashier. The institution did a general banking business and had a capital stock of thirty thousand dollars. They operated as the Bank of Grafton until 1884, when the first named bank was organized, the same officers continuing. Mr. Hartwell later retired and Mr. Fulton was chosen president. They have a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars, and carry deposits amounting to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the bank has undivided surplus of sixty thousand dollars. Mr. D. C. Moore, cashier, has handled the business of the institution for many years, and his skillful management has placed it foremost among the substantial institutions of the Northwest.

He was reared and educated in his native state and went to Iowa in 1872 and engaged in the real estate business there until 1875 at Decorah, and then followed the practice of law until 1879, and was then elected sheriff of the county and again served in that capacity in 1881. He resigned his office to go to Grafton, North Dakota, and has been associated with the bank of which he now has the management since that date. He is a man of excellent business qualifications and whatever enlists his attention is almost sure of meeting with success. He is careful and systematic in all details and has a clear head and a good education, and is well-known as a man of the highest honor and is respected by all with whom he has to do so. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity. He does not seek public preferment and takes no part in political affairs.

He entered claim to land as a homestead in 1892 and erected a house and began farming. He had a few horses, but was without means, but is now the owner of thirteen hundred and fifty acres of land and has about one thousand acres of his farm under cultivation. He has five acres of forest trees, a residence, barn, granaries, sheds, windmill, blacksmith shop and other buildings and all necessary machinery, and also owns and operates a twenty-two-horse-power steam threshing rig. He engages in grain raising and has marketed ten thousand bushels of products in one year. He has met with eminent success and enjoys the comforts of rural life. During the winter of 1893-1894 and the summer of 1896 he traveled as an aeronaut through Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Missouri, Arkansas and Illinois. He is engaged in the real estate, loans, and insurance business in Hillsboro, and is one of the best known men of Traill county. He has interested himself largely in the financial enterprises of the city and in all matters of a public nature and all projects tending to the development and improvement of that locality he has taken an active interest and aided by his counsel and liberality.

He has been identified with the growth of the country and every enterprise to which he devoted his attention has been successful in its results, and he has gained an enviable reputation as a citizen and business man.

Our subject was born in Huron county, Ohio, September 8, 1857. The name is of French origin, and his ancestors were among the French Huguenots who left their native country for Holland. His ancestry in this country dates to the days of its early settlement, he being a direct descendant of Peregrine White, the first white child born in New England. His grandparents moved from Worcester, Massachusetts, to Ohio by ox team in 1832, and settled in Lorain county, and his grandfather was once a trustee of Oberlin College.

Mr. Boise was the oldest in a family of five children, and was a son of Spencer W. and Celestia E. (Gould) Boise, both residents of Ohio. He was raised on the home farm and remained there until seventeen years of age. He entered the preparatory department of Oberlin College in March, 1875, and graduated from that institution with the class of 1880, with the degree of A. B. Excelling in the languages, he planned a career as teacher of these branches. He came to Dakota in April, 1881, and upon his arrival entered claim to land on section 26, in Hope township, Tower City being the nearest railroad point. There were no buildings in the township until that spring, and he hauled lumber twenty-five miles from Tower City and erected a 10x12 shanty, one of the first buildings in the township. He built a frame house the following fall, and soon afterward had a farm of three hundred and seventy-five acres under plow. He resided on the farm and steadily improved the place and met with unbounded success. Sheep culture was successfully carried on during the years 1890-98. Mrs. Boise's ill health caused him to leave the farm in 1894, and he accepted his present position in 1895.

Our subject was married, in 1882, to Miss Grace S. Pomroy, a native of Bristol, New York. Mrs. Boise was a student of Oberlin College, and was by profession a teacher. WILLIAM M. KEATING. The subject of this notice is certainly entitled to be considered not only one of the enterprising farmers of Richland county, but one of its most respected and honored citizens, and a man of more than ordinary ability. His residence is situated on section 29, Centre township, where he has made his home since 1880. To his original purchase of one hundred and sixty acres he has added until he now has six hundred and forty acres of rich and arable land, which he has placed under a high state of cultivation. Upon the place he erected a good set of farm buildings in 1897, and has made many other improvements which fall to the value and attractive appearance of the farm.

Mr. Keating was born in Queens county, Ireland, December 22, 1846, a son of William and Mary (Brennan) Keating, both of whom died in Centre township, Richland county, North Dakota, the former October 16, 1886, at the age of eighty-seven years, the latter May 7, 1886, at the age of seventy-three. When only a year old our subject was brought by his parents to America and for some years the family made their home in Vermont. From there they removed to Grant county, Wisconsin, where William M. Keating grew to manhood and was married, May 17, 1876, to Miss Nora Flynn, who was born in Beloit, Wisconsin, October 27, 1855, and was reared in Grant county, and there taught school for a number of years, and in Richland county, North Dakota, for two years. Her parents William D. and Catherine (Sullivan) Flynn, spent their last days in Grant county, the former dying September 30, 1880, aged seventy-six years, the later August 1, 1898, aged seventy-six years. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Keating, but William, the eldest, died in Centre township, Richland county, North Dakota, June 24, 1895, at the age of eighteen years and three months. Those living are Peter Leo, Dennis J., John F. and Nora C.

In the spring of 1880 Mr. Keating, with his family, left his old home in Grant county, Wisconsin, and came to Richland county, North Dakota, locating on the farm where he still makes his home. His time and attention have since been devoted to its improvement and cultivation with most gratifying results. He was one of the defenders of the Union during the Civil war, having enlisted in October, 1864, in Company I, Twentieth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry. He was in the service one year and at the battle of Spanish Fort was slightly wounded in the left side. He is now an honored member of Sumner Post, No. 7, G. A. R., and he and his family belong to St. John's Catholic church of Wahpeton.

For the past eighteen years this gentleman, of whom a portrait will be found on another page, has tilled the soil of Foster county, and he now has one of the finest farms of the county, his home being located in township 147, range 66. He has made a success of general farming and is held in a high esteem as a farmer and citizen of true worth.

He was born on a farm near Christiansund, Norway, August 8, 1863. His father, Thorstein Erikson Halaas, was a farmer and carpenter by trade and lived and died in Norway. The mother of our subject, who bore the maiden name of Randi Oleson, came to America in 1892 after the death of our subject's father and now makes her home in Fargo, North Dakota.

Mr. Halaas is the fifth in a family of eight children and was raised on the farm and at the age of thirteen years left home and hired out to farm work for two years, and then went to Christiansund and worked in a general store for his uncle, P. Oleson, and remained there three years. He came to America at the age of eighteen years, landing at Boston, and at once went to Milan, Chippewa county, Minnesota, where he hired out at farming and also attended English school. He came to North Dakota in the spring of 1883 and traveled over the northern part of the state in quest of a location, and in May hired out on a farm in Grand Forks county. December, 1883, and built a shanty, 6x8 feet, and a sod barn, and farmed with oxen three years. He raised his first crop in 1884 and in 1885 raised eighteen to twenty bushels of wheat per acre. He lived alone the first four years and during the early days had many exciting experiences with prairie fires, and in 1897 fire destroyed his barn and seventy-five tons of hay, twenty-nine head of hogs, six work horses and a full blooded Shire stallion, valued at six hundred dollars, the loss amounting to three thousand dollars, with no insurance. He now has a farm of twelve hundred and eighty acres, with all but a half-section under cultivation and one hundred and sixty acres in pasture. He has two sets of farm buildings and his residence and surrounding buildings are substantial and commodious and furnish a home of comfort and are as good as any in that region. Mr. Halaas began life in North Dakota with very little means, having only enough to file his claim and erect a shanty, and the other means with which he purchased his early supplies was on borrowed money, which he worked out. He now has one of the finest farms of Foster county and in 1895 raised ten thousand bushels of grain.

Our subject was county assessor in 1890, 1891 and 1892, and in 1892 was elected county commissioner, and is now serving his third term in that capacity. He is actively interested in the general welfare of his community and is deservedly popular with the people among whom he has lived for so many years. He holds membership in the Ancient Order of United Workmen and in political sentiment is a Republican. Mr. Halaas was married, July 14, 1887, to Lina B. Rusten, who was born in Norway, near the city of Hamar, in 1858, daughter of Berger and Ely Rusten. To Mr. and Mrs. Halaas six children have been born: Theodore, Ralph, Ole, Leonard, Olga and Cora.

He was ordained a minister in the summer of 1889 and given charge at Brainerd, Minnesota, which he held until 1892 and then took his present charge in Hillsboro. The Synod Lutheran church was organized in 1892 by Rev. J. Ingelstad, and at the time of our subject taking charge of the pastorate numbered about fifteen families. The membership has increased steadily since that time and now numbers about forty families. The church edifice was built in 1893 and is a wooden structure, but has the largest seating capacity of any church in the city. It is handsomely finished and is one of the leading churches of the county.

Mr. Porter was born in Bradford county, Pennsylvania, May 25, 1831. He was raised on a farm and received but three months' schooling a year until seventeen years of age, when he was apprenticed to learn the carpenter's trade. He served thus three years and in November, 1851, began a journey, which took him to California, via Nicaragua. While there he "roughed it" for about three years and engaged in gold mining and on one occasion paid fifty dollars in gold for forty-nine pounds of flour. He started to cross the mountains prospecting and during that time had many thrilling experiences and the high waters of Carson creek turned him back and he eventually returned, via the Isthmus of Panama. He returned to Bradford county, Pennsylvania, and followed carpenter work until August 24, 1861, when he enlisted, among the first to answer the call for three-years volunteers, and became a member of Company F, Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry. He received his equipments at Washington and went from thence to Fort Monroe and was in the department of the James river under Major-General Wool and also Dicks, Butler and Grant. He was at Suffolk, Virginia, when Grant commenced the battles of the Wilderness and then went on the raid into North Carolina and destroyed the railway bridge under a fort guarded by two thousand rebels. He was a sergeant and carried dispatches and also engaged in three raids, one of which lasted twelve days with a loss of twenty-one guns and some prisoners and ambulance corps. Our subject was dismounted forty miles within the rebel lines. He threw away his saber and after four days without food, crawling through woods and wading streams, he managed to reach the Union lines. After three years of brave and loyal service he was mustered out August 28, 1864, and returned to Williamsport, Pennsylvania. He worked at his trade there for many years and in the spring of 1882 went to North Dakota and resided in Jamestown from April of that year till July, 1885. Soon after locating in Dakota he filed on land in township 137, range 65, as a homestead pre-emption, on which he erected a small shanty and a sod barn with a straw roof and he sowed his first crop in the spring of 1883. Politically, he is a Republican and is strong in his convictions. He has served two years on the city board and is well known and popular with the people.

CHARLES B. THIMENS, the present well-known superintendent of the water works of Fargo and one of the old and popular steamboat captains on the rivers of the Northwest, was born in Montreal, Canada, March 27, 1831, and is a son of Noel and Marie (Gilban) Thimens, who spent their entire lives in that country, the father following the occupation of farming. In their family were three sons, but all are now deceased, with the exception of our subject. He was reared and educated in his native land and on starting out in life for himself engaged in farming and clerking there until twenty years of age.

In the fall of 1851 Mr. Thimens landed in St. Paul, Minnesota, and soon began lumbering on the Rum river. Later he turned his attention to steamboating on the Mississippi and Minnesota rivers and followed that pursuit for thirty years, becoming pilot and captain and also part owner of vessels for several years. For five years he was in the quartermaster's department during the Civil war, carrying troops and supplies up and down the river. In 1874 he went to Moorhead, Minnesota, and took charge of a boat for the Red River Transportation Company, running between Moorhead and Winnipeg, Manitoba, for fourteen years. He was next connected with the Grandon line of boats, carrying grain to Fargo and Moorhead and remained with that company until 1893. In 1882 he took up his residence in Fargo, where he has since continued to make his home and is prominently identified with public affairs. He served as street commissioner two years, and has since had charge of the water works. He has proved a most competent man for the place, and his duties are discharged in a prompt and satisfactory manner.

In 1858, Mr. Thimens was united in marriage with Miss Sarah H. Grant, a native of Vermont, and to them were born two children, namely: Minnie, now Mrs. F. Painter, and Dora. Since the organization of the Republican party our subject has been one of its staunch supporters and he has ever taken an active and commendable interest in political affairs. He is a thirty-second-degree Mason, a member of the Scottish Rite and is a man highly respected and esteemed by all who know him. In his early steamboat career he endured all the hardships and privations incident to such a life, but, like most of his class, he is a jovial, genial gentleman, who makes hosts of friends wherever he goes.

CHARLES J. LEE, well-known druggist of Valley City, North Dakota, is one of the prominent young men of that place, a leader in business and social circles. The business interests of the city are well represented by him and whether in public or private life, he is always a courteous, genial gentleman, well deserving the high regard in which he is held.

Mr. Lee was born in the village of Arcadia, Trempealeau county, Wisconsin, January 9, 1860. His father, John Lee, was a native of Norway, born in 1810, and in early life he engaged in farming in that country. On his emigration to America he settled in La Crosse county, Wisconsin, during the pioneer days of that state, when but two houses stood on the present site of the city. Subsequently he took up a homestead where Winona, Minnesota, is now located. In West Salem, Wisconsin, he married Miss Christina Johnson, who still survives him and now makes her home in Green Bay, that state.

During his boyhood and youth Charles J. Lee aided his father in the operation of the home farm and acquired his early education in the district schools of the neighborhood. On coming to Barnes county, North Dakota, he worked for one season on a farm and then removed to Valley City, where he attended school and also worked. In 1893 he entered the Northwestern University at Chicago, Illinois, and took a pharmaceutical course, graduating the following year. He at once returned to Valley City and has since successfully engaged in the drug business at that place, having built up a large and constantly increasing trade. He is now a director in the Valley City State Bank and is also extensively interested in real estate, owning at the present time about one thousand acres of land. This property has been acquired through his own well-directed efforts and good management, for he is a business man of more than ordinary ability, enterprising and energetic.

In 1897 Mr. Lee married Miss Mary Holver-son, of Trempealeau county, Wisconsin. He takes a commendable interest in public affairs and although still a young man he has most creditably served as president of the city council. In 1898 he was president of the Pharmaceutical Association of North Dakota, and is past chancellor of the subordinate lodge of Knights of Pythias.

OLIVER M. FRASER. As a gentleman of the highest integrity and an efficient public officer of Walsh county, the gentleman above named is well known. He has served five successive terms as auditor of Walsh county and has built up an enviable reputation for uprightness of character and sound financial methods. His career has been one of continued successes in every direction in which his faculties have been directed and in matters tending to promote the general welfare and to develop the business or society interests of his adopted town he has taken a hearty interest and aided materially in various ways in the upbuilding and strengthening of good local government and as a man and citizen is held in the highest esteem.

Our subject was born in Kingston, Ontario, Canada, June 12, 1859. His parents, John and Kate (Mowat) Fraser, were natives of Scotland and Canada, respectively, and passed their lives in Canada, where the father was a merchant. Our subject was reared and educated in Canada, attending the Collegiate Institute. He spent some time afterward in Canada and in 1880 went to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and engaged in the lumber business there one year and then engaged in the machine trade and in 1883 came to Grafton. Here he worked in the county treasurer's office two years and was also engaged as city justice and also followed the loan and insurance business during 1887-1888 and in the fall of 1888 was elected county auditor. His efficiency and popularity are best evidenced by the fact that he has been elected to that office five consecutive times. He is also United States commissioner for North Dakota.

Our subject was married in 1880, to Miss Eugenie Gjeme, a native of Norway. Mr. and Mrs. Fraser are the parents of two sons and one daughter. Mr. Fraser is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Foresters and Knights of Pythias and in political sentiment has been a life-long Democrat.

JOHN DORSEY. Among the self-made men of Richland county, North Dakota, who have accumulated what they have of this world's goods through their own energy, industry and perseverance, may be numbered the gentleman whose name introduces this sketch. He is now a resident of Mooreton township, and owns and operates a most desirable farm on section 13.

A native of Minnesota, Mr. Dorsey was born in Goodhue county, March 8, 1859, and is a son of Michael and Mary (Heffron) Dorsey. The father died in Goodhue county in 1864, when about thirty-eight years of age, but the mother is still living. In the county of his nativity, our subject received a fair common-school education and was reared to habits of industry. On leaving home at the age of fifteen years he started out to make his own way in the world and during early life was employed at different occupations, but chiefly at farm labor. In 1879 he removed from Minnesota to North Dakota and has since been a resident of Richland county with the exception of about a year spent in his native state. For two years during his residence in North Dakota he was engaged in the agricultural implement business, but since the spring of 1890 has devoted his entire time and attention to agricultural pursuit of his present farm, comprising six hundred and forty acres of rich and arable land.

On the 10th of March, 1880, in Richland county, Mr. Dorsey was united in marriage to Miss Mary Boynton, who was born in Canada July 22, 1860, a daughter of Thomas and Susan (Turner) Bovnton, both natives of England. The father died at Port Perry, Ontario, Canada, at the age of seventy-two years, but the mother still survives. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Dorsey, namely: Walter, who died in infancy, Grace, Neil and Doris. Mr. Dorsey has taken quite an active and prominent part in the public affairs of his township, was treasurer of Centre township for two terms and is the present township and school treasurer of Mooreton township.

OLOF P. PETERSON. The stock-raising and agricultural interests of township 147, range 64, of Foster county, have a worthy representative in the person of Mr. Peterson. He has a comfortable home in section 25 and has gained an enviable reputation in that locality as a farmer and citizen.

Our subject was born on a farm in the southern part of Sweden April 6, 1859, and is a son of Peter and Karna (Jepson) Peterson, who lived in Sweden throughout their lives.

Mr. Peterson was the eldest in a family of four children and was raised on a farm and attended the common schools. He left home when a young man and worked out at farm labor in Sweden five years and at the age of twenty-one years emigrated to America and at once went to Red Wing, Minnesota, and during the first fall worked at railroad work there. He remained in Minnesota until 1887 and worked for others, and then he and his brother bought a small place and followed grain raising principally for three years and met with good success. Our subject came to Foster county, North Dakota, in July, 1890, and worked at odd jobs in Carrington two years. He bought a sixteen-horse-power steam threshing outfit in 1892 and has followed threshing since that date. He purchased land in section 25, township 147, range 64, and built a set of farm buildings thereon in 1896 and began stock raising. He has a cattle barn 56 x 202 feet, and a horse barn 28 x 60 feet, with a lean-to, and a sheep shed 56 x 60 feet, and also has all machinery for conducting a good farm. He and his partner own two thousand four hundred acres of land, with five hundred under cultivation, and the James river runs through the land from north to south. He engages in stock raising principally and has one hundred and seventy-five head of cattle and one hundred and seventy-five head of sheep, and has been successful in this line.

Mr. Peterson is a member of the Knights of Pythias and is well known in the locality in which he resides. He takes an active part in local affairs and politically is a Republican and has attended numerous county conventions and has been inspector in the last two elections in his township.

HON. GUNDER HOWARD. In the person of the above named gentleman the city of Hillsboro has a worthy business man and citizen and the county and state has an able representative. Mr. Howard, of whom a portrait is presented on another page, is popular, progressive and energetic, and his financial interests are of such amount as to allow generosity and liberality in public enterprises, while he lends an influence for good in the community in which he makes his home. He is engaged in the implement business in Hillsboro and has extensive agricultural interests in that locality.

Gunder Howard was born in Norway and was the eldest of a family of five children. His father died while Gunder was but a young boy and at the age of thirteen he assisted his mother in the support of the family. He and the mother and family came to America when he was but seventeen years of age and settled in Houston county, Minnesota, where relatives lived, and Mr. Howard worked at farm labor in that locality, and with the help of the younger children supplied the wants of the family. His uncle tendered him a loan of one hundred dollars in 1873 and with this he invested in a yoke of cattle, and the family drove about five hundred miles westward to Minnesota. The mother entered land near Moorhead and our subject "squatted" on a quarter-section and farmed his and his mother's land, comprising one half-section, for two years. He worked for others in 1875 in the implement business in Fargo, and in 1880 went to Hillsboro and, with A. H. Morgan, established the first implement business of the city. The partnership was dissolved after one year, since which time Mr. Howard has conducted the business alone and his present large business is the outgrowth of that mall start. He erected the lower story of his building, 50x100 feet, in 1886, and a stock company added a story the same year to be used as an opera house. Mr. Howard, in company with Mr. Easton Halverson, owns a farm of over one thousand acres, situated in a most productive part of the Red river valley, and from his farming interests alone receives a comfortable income.

HON. GUNDER HOWARD.

Mr. Howard was a member of the lower house in 1896 and introduced many of the measures which are now important laws. He served as a member of the following committees: Banks and banking, railroads, warehouse, grain grading and dealing and supplies and expenditures. He served as state boiler inspector for the third judicial district in 1891-92. He is a member of the United Lutheran church and is a thirty-second-degree Mason. Politically he is a Republican and strong in his convictions. His success is well merited and he is one of the men who are popular regardless of party affiliations and held in high esteem by all.

Our subject was married in Chicago, Illinois, in 1856, to Miss Mary H. Forbes, a daughter of Albert G. Forbes, an iron manufacturer. Mrs. Lyon was of Scotch descent, and her great-grandfather, John Forbes, was a captain in the Revolutionary war. Two sons and two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lyon, as follows: Mary, now Mrs. Wadsworth, of California; Walter H., now residing in California; Julia, a teacher in the public schools of Minneapolis, Minnesota; and Frederick S., an attorney at law in Minneapolis. Mr. Lyon is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Sons of the Revolution. He is president of North Dakota board for asylum for insane and was active in getting the building erected and the institution established. He was a member of the board of education in Jamestown and labors for a higher standard in school matters. Politically he is a Republican and stand firmly to the principles of his party.

GEORGE L. RYERSON, clerk of the district court of Grand Forks county, is one of the rising young men of North Dakota. He is a gentleman of broad mind, is energetic and progressive and well merits his high standing as an officer and citizen.

Our subject was born in Waushara county, Wisconsin, January 8, 1869, and is a son of Gus and Emma (Anderson) Ryerson, natives respectively of Norway and Wisconsin. His father emigrated to the United States in company with his parents and settled in Chicago, and later moved to Wisconsin, where he engaged in farming, and still resides in that state. He has been a life-long Republican, and has for many years taken an active part in the Republican politics of Grand Forks county.

EDWARD WEBER, who is well known throughout Cass county as a prosperous agriculturist, who is doing an extensive business in Everest township, is a man of ability. He makes his home in section 9, and has secured by industry and hard work the comforts of a happy country home.

Our subject was born near Landskron, Austria, September 28, 1849, and was a son of Bernhardt and Rosa (Wurst) Weber, both of whom were natives of the same province. His parents were farmers by occupation and came to America in 1868, locating in Steele county, Minnesota, with our subject, who had preceded them. The father later purchased and lived in Minnesota until 1879, when he removed to Cass county, North Dakota, and engaged in farming on land which had been purchased in 1877. He followed farming in Cass county many years and died in Casselton, in February, 1895, aged seventy-two years. The mother survives and is residing at Everett, Washington, where two sons live.

Our subject was reared in Germany till the age of seventeen years, and in 1867 came to America, landing at New York. He went at once to Minnesota, where he purchased land and followed farming until 1882. He visited Cass county, North Dakota, in 1877, in company with Frank and Joseph Langer, and purchased the section where he now resides, and also purchased a half section for his brother and father. He began the improvement of the land in 1880 and in 1883 removed his family there and has since followed farming on the land. He is now the owner of five sections, all of which is under cultivation, and during the season of 1899 raised twenty-six thousand bushels of wheat, one thousand four hundred bushels of flax and seven thousand bushels of oats. He also follows stock raising to some extent and devotes his entire attention to his agricultural pursuits.

Our subject was married in Steele county, in 1871, to Rosa Stangler, a native of Germany. Mrs. Weber's parents came to America in 1864 and settled in Minnesota. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Weber, as follows: Julius E., Emil E., Edward L., Otto E., Gustus F., and Henrietta R., deceased. The family are members of the Catholic church and assisted in the erection of the present fine edifice of that denomination in Casselton. Mr. Weber has filled numerous township offices and has served as assessor for the past twelve years. Politically he is a Democrat and strong in his convictions.

FREDERICK A. BAGG, a popular and highly esteemed citizen of Mooreton township, Richland county, is the efficient manager of the Downing farm, which comprises over five thousand acres of land in Mooreton and Garfield townships, and is one of the most valuable estates in the county. Mr. Bagg is a native of Massachusetts, born in South Hadley, July 1, 1858, and is a son of Hiram A. and Harriet (Cleveland) Bagg, also natives of the old Bay state. The father was born in Worthington and died in South Hadley at the age of fifty-two years, but the mother is still living. In their family were four children, namely: Frederick A., Lucy H., Harriet C. and Earl H. A.

Our subject was reared in South Hadley and obtained a good practical education in the public schools of that place. He remained there until the spring of 1887, when he came to North Dakota and entered the employ of J. F. Downing, of Richland county, as a carpenter. A year later he assumed the management of the Downing farm, and in its operation has displayed remarkable business ability, sound judgment and keen foresight. During harvest time he often has one hundred men working under his supervision, and his long retention in his responsible position testifies to his efficiency and trustworthiness. He has prospered during his residence in this state and is now the owner of four hundred and eighty acres of fine farming land.

In Richland county, Mr. Bagg was married, January 1, 1890, to Miss Sophia Larson, who was born in Norway and brought to America when two years old. To them were born five children, namely: Edna, who died at the age of one year; Urbin, who died in infancy; Harriet, Florence and Hiram A., residing at home.

ISAAC J. OLIVER. The mature years of this gentleman have been devoted almost exclusively to the calling of a farmer, and he has acquired a valuable knowledge of this occupation in performing the duties and labors incident to the management of one of the fine estates of Springer township, Ransom county. His career previous to engaging in the pursuit of agriculture was an eventful one, and the quiet of his rural life on a Dakota valley farm is valued because of its comforts and enjoyments. His home is on section 17, of township 135, range 57, and his farm consists of one half-section of valley and prairie land.

Our subject was born in Cass county, Indiana, September 10, 1850, and was the seventh in a family of ten children born to John W. and Rhoda (Watts) Oliver. The Oliver family is of English-Yankee descent, and the Watts family, also of English descent, were Virginia pioneers.

Our subject lived in his native state on a farm until about fourteen years of age, when, in 1864, he ran away from home, and enlisted, May 6, 1864, in Company F, Third Battalion, Fourteenth United States Infantry, and was stationed in Kentucky until the close of the war. He was sent to California in the spring of 1865, as a member of Company F, Thirty-second United States Infantry, and during the service experienced several skirmishes with the Indians. His term as a soldier expired in 1867, and he remained in Arizona and New Mexico, following the life of a cowboy. He left Arizona June 2, 1870, for Texas, in company with a prospector, one of the '49ers, and traveled through about eight hundred miles of country wherein hostile Indians were plentiful. The journey covered six weeks, and was replete with adventures. He then returned to Indiana, where he engaged in farming until 1876, when he engaged in the lumber business, and in the spring of 1879 went to Fargo, North Dakota, and in October of that year located his valley farm on the Military Reservation in Ransom county. Five families were living in the Shyenne valley at that point, and in December one of the most severe blizzards known to northern Dakota visited that region. The storm drove thousands of antelope to the valley for shelter. The military reservation, where our subject's claim was located was surveyed and opened for settlement and he secured work with the surveying party and became thoroughly acquainted with the topography of the country. The old log house which was his pioneer home still stands, and is in striking contrast to the valuable improvements of that region. Mr. Oliver has made a success of farming in Dakota, and is one of the pioneers who can review his experiences and give authentic history of that country.

Our subject was married, in 1872, to Miss Matilda McCombs, a native of Cass county, Indiana. Six children have blessed the home of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver, named as follows: Iona A., Bertha, Ira L., Angus J., Ella M. and Fred L. Mr. Oliver is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Modern Woodmen of America. Politically he is a Republican and stands firmly for the principles of his party.

HOWARD WILSON, one of the earliest pioneers of Griggs county, is successfully pursuing agriculture in Dover township, and has a pleasant home on section 6. He endured the hardships incident to life in an unsettled country, and made his way forward to his present comfortable circumstances with a determination worthy of following.

Our subject was born on a farm in York county, Canada, May 18, 1860, and was the third child and eldest son in a family of nine children, five sons and four daughters. The father, Samuel L. Wilson, was a native of York county, and was a farmer and carpenter. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of Jane Walks. The father died in 1878, and the mother survives him and makes her home with her children, all of whom are still living.

Our subject attended the district school near his home and assisted his father on the farm until he was eighteen years of age, when he began to work for others, and in 1883 went to Barnes county, North Dakota, where he remained, and on the 8th day of June, of that year, he filed a claim to his present farm as a homestead. He is now the owner of nine quarter-sections of land, and one quarter-section is in Stutsman county. He worked in the pineries of Minnesota during the winters of 1883, '84 and '85, and the following winter carried mail each Saturday, from Uxbridge, now Leal, to Sanborn and return, and spent the balance of the week attending school at Leal. When he located on his farm for permanent residence he was his own housekeeper for three years, and then employed a housekeeper three years. His first wheat crop was from ten acres of land, and after hauling it five miles to have it threshed and putting it into the granery, prairie fire destroyed the annual products. Such discouragements did not daunt him and he is now among the fortunate farmers of that locality.

Our subject was married, in Cooperstown, June 19, 1893, to Miss Mary E. Hilborn, a native of York county, Canada, and a daughter of Henry and Elizabeth Hilborn, prominent farmers of Barnes county. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, as follows: Milton H., Clifford H. and Fred S. Mr. Wilson is prominent in public affairs, and has held various offices in his county and township. He was appointed to fill an unexpired term on the board of county commissioners, in 1896, and the following year was elected to serve a term of three years in that capacity. He has always taken an active interest in educational affairs, and has served as school clerk in his district for the past ten years. In point of continuous residence he is the oldest settler in Dover township, and is highly esteemed throughout that region. Politically he is an independent voter.

EMERSON H. SMITH, one of Fargo's most prominent and influential citizens, is now the junior member of the well-known law firm of Newton & Smith. Although he has but recently become a member of the bar, he has already won distinction in his chosen profession. Thoroughness characterizes all his efforts, and he conducts all his business with a strict regard to a high standing of professional ethics.

Mr. Smith was born in Orange county, Vermont, April 8, 1854, and is a son of Richard and Frances (Hall) Smith, also natives of that state, where the father was successfully engaged in business as a stock raiser and tinsmith throughout life. He was a man of prominence in his community and was honored with a number of public positions, serving as a member of the lower house of the Vermont legislature, is a man of excellent ability and a good capacity for well-directed labor, and has placed himself in a high station among his fellows. He makes his home in section 9 and has gathered about him islature for two terms, and as constable sixteen years. He was also captain of Company E, Second Vermont Volunteer Infantry, during the Civil war, and was in the service for two years and a half, participating with the Army of the Potomac in the battle of the Wilderness and in other important engagements. He died in Vermont in 1890, at the ripe old age of seventy-nine years, and his wife passed away in 1878. To them were born five children, four sons and one daughter, of whom two sons now reside in Fargo, North Dakota. The paternal grandfather of our subject, Ebenezer Smith, was also a native of Vermont and a son of Jonathan Smith, whose father, James Smith, was the founder of the family in the new world. He was born in England and on his emigration to this country settled in Middleboro, Massachusetts. He entered the Continental army during the Revolutionary war and died in the service, while his son Jonathan was a soldier in the war of 1812. Ebenezer Smith was an extensive farmer, owning one thousand acres of land, and for a quarter of a century he was selectman in his town. He had a family of thirteen children, eight sons and five daughters.

In the old Green Mountain state Emerson H. Smith grew to manhood and received excellent educational advantages, attending the St. Johnsbury Academy and the Randolph Normal School, both in Vermont, and the Meridian Academy of New Hampshire. He then entered Dartmouth College, from which he was graduated in 1882. He was made principal of the schools at Newmarket, New Hampshire, and served as such for two years, during which time he took up the study of law with Judge Mellows, of that place. As his health failed, he came west in 1884 to Fargo, and was superintendent of the city schools here for seven years, or until 1891. He then followed farming for one year and resumed the study of law with Seth Newman. He was elected mayor of Fargo in 1892, and during the two years he filled that office did much to assist the city after the great fire. He again took up the study of law and was admitted to the bar before the supreme court in 1896. He at once opened an office in Fargo and alone engaged in practice until forming his present partnership, in 1897. He is meeting with well-deserved success and occupies an enviable position among the representative legal practitioners of the city. As a Republican he takes quite an active and prominent part in political affairs, and in the interests of his party has made many speeches throughout the state. He still maintains an interest in educational affairs and for five years was one of the trustees of Fargo College.

On the 16th of August, 1882, Mr. Smith was united in marriage with Miss Ella Knight, who was born in Orleans county, Vermont, and they became the parents of two children, but only Helen E. is now living.

JUDGE C. F. TEMPLETON, senior member of the firm of Templeton & Rex, is an attorney of note and has long stood at the head of the Grand Forks county bar. He is thoroughly learned in his profession, always a student as well as practitioner, intelligent, and devoted to the interests entrusted to his keeping, is earnest in his convictions and an able advocate, and impresses upon his listeners his own convictions. He has built up an extensive practice in Grand Forks, and is one of the public-spirited citizens of that city.

Our subject was born in Washington county, Vermont, June 21, 1856, and was a son of Horatio and Rhoda (Folsom) Templeton, both of whom were natives of Vermont. The father was engaged in farming and the general merchandise business and died in Vermont in 1895, aged seventy-six years.

Mr. Templeton was reared and educated in his native state and attended Barre Academy, at Barre, Vermont, and entered Dartmouth College in 1874 and graduated from the institution in 1878. He at once began the study of law at Montpelier, Vermont, and was admitted to practice in December, 1880. During the same year he went to Fargo and formed a partnership with Hon. B. F. Spaulding, which existed until July, 1887, he having been appointed by Governor Church attorney-general for the territory, and he served until October, 1888, and then resigned to accept the judgeship of the old eighth judicial district, being appointed by Cleveland in October, 1888. He was re-elected in 1889 and 1893, and continued on the bench until 1897. January 1, 1897, he resumed his practice at Grand Forks, having removed to that city in 1889. He and Mr. Scott Rex are now associated in the practice of law, and are widely known throughout that region and receive a good share of the patronage.

Mr. Templeton was married, in Vermont, in 1881, to Miss Edna C. Carleton, a native of Vermont. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Templeton, named as follows: Bertha C., Maud R., Francis H. and Ruth C. Mr. Templeton is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and has passed the Knight Templar degree of the order. He is a Democrat politically and has affiliated with the party throughout his career, but takes but little part in political movements.

JAMES O. WOLD, an enterprising member of the farming community of Ransom county, has devoted the greater part of his life to agriculture, in the pursuit of which he has been very fortunate. He is proprietor of a fine farm in Liberty township, his homestead being located there in section 8.

Our subject was born near Bergen, Norway, March 25, 1842, and was the second in a family of eight children born to Ole J. and Maria (Johnsen) Wold. The mother now lives in Minnesota and our subject is now the oldest of her living children. He worked in his native country by the year until he became of age, and then crossed the ocean to America, locating in Dane county, Wisconsin, where his cousin resided. Later he went to Winnesiek county, Iowa, and there passed his first winter in America, attending the public school and soon acquired a good English education. He purchased a farm in Moore county, Minnesota, and there resided until the spring of 1882, when he disposed of his interests and went to North Dakota. He spent one month in Cass county, and then located on the farm which he now owns, filing a homestead claim to the land. He had seven head of cattle and three horses, but was without means, and for the necessities he and his two sons worked out by the day. He is careful in the conduct of his farm and by the best of management has acquired a well improved property, consisting of one half-section of land. His barn, 46x50 feet, furnishes shelter for his stock and products and a good well, with windmill attached, supplies an abundance of good water.

Our subject was married, in 1863, to Miss Oriine Andersen. Mr. and Mrs. Wold have been the parents of eight children, as follows: Andrew, now married and living in Eddy county; Ole, at home; Maria, now Mrs. K. Syverson, living in Eddy county; John, farming in Eddy county; Albert; Annie, deceased; Christian and James. Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Wold appear on another page. Mr. Wold is a member of the Lutheran church. He occupies a prominent position as a citizen and takes an active interest in local affairs. Politically he is a Republican and a usual delegate to county conventions of his party and a recognized leader.

JOHN P. BRAND. No better illustration of the characteristic energy and enterprise of the typical German-American citizen can be found than that afforded by the career of this prosperous and successful farmer, now residing on section 24, Mooreton township, Richland county, North Dakota. Coming to this county with no capital except his abilities he has made his way to success through wisely-directed effort and he can now look back with satisfaction upon past struggles.

Mr. Brand was born in Germany, February 22, 1849, and in 1852 was brought to America by his parents, John and Catherine (Maurer) Brand, who first settled in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, remaining there about five years. The family then removed to Manitowoc county, the same state, and located on a farm, where the mother died in April, 1890, at the age of sixty-six years. The father still survives and has reached an advanced age.

Our subject remained upon the home farm, assisting his father in its operation, until fifteen years of age, when he went to Kenosha county, Wisconsin, and worked upon a farm for five summers. The following two years were spent in the pineries of northern Michigan, and at the end of that time he went to the Lake Superior region, where he remained until 1875. Returning to Wisconsin, he located in St. Croix county, where he made his home until coming to Dakota in 1879. He borrowed money with which to bring him to this state and purchased a horse on time of John F. Pape, of St. Croix county. He thus started in this state not only without means, but in debt. He took up a government claim in Richland county, on which he has since made his home. His well-directed efforts have been crowned with success and he is now the owner of a whole section of fine farming land in Mooreton township, upon which he has erected good buildings and made other valuable and useful improvements.

In St. Croix county, Wisconsin, Mr. Brand was married, June 28, 1875, to Miss Bena Bengart, who was born in Germany, October 15, 1848, and when six years old accompanied her parents, Philip and Catherine (Jost) Bengart, on their emigration to the New World. For ten years they were residents of Manitowoc county, Wisconsin, and then spent some time in the Lake Superior country, after which they returned to Wisconsin and settled in St. Croix county, where the father died at the age of seventy years, and the mother at the age of eighty-one. To Mr. and Mrs. Brand were born the following children: John H., who is now a member of Company I, First North Dakota Volunteer Infantry, and took an active part in the Manila campaign of the Spanish-American war; J. Leroy and Alice M., at home; and Henrietta L., who died at the age of six months.

THOR G. DAHL, one of the well known and influential business men of Hillsboro, is engaged in the abstract business there and is also part owner of the Hillsboro Roller Mills. He was born in Bratsberg, Christian Sands Stift, Norway, September 1, 1857, and was the youngest in a family of eight children.

Mr. Dahl's parents, Gunleik and Liv (Bleka) Dale, were natives of Norway, and the mother still lives and makes her home there. Our subject was given a liberal education and prepared himself for teaching, and when nineteen years of age went to Christiania and completed a commercial course and then applied himself for about one year to office work. He then came to America in 1879 to try his fortunes in the New World and at once went to Freeborn county, Minnesota, and taught a Norwegian school in Albert Lea. He attended a high school in the city one year and with the education gained in his native land had a good start. He then went to Portland, Traill county, North Dakota, in the spring of 1882, and spent four years clerking in a general merchandise store, during which time he secured a homestead in Steele county, that state. He went to Portland in 1885, after proving up on his land, and then began work for the Breed & Lennen Lumber Company, and was in their employ about three years, when he purchased the yard and conducted the business for about five years. He was elected register of deeds of Traill county, and with his family removed to the county seat, and served four years. He purchased a set of abstract books in the fall of 1894 and has since conducted abstracting. He purchased a half interest in the Hillsboro Roller Mills in February, 1897, a mill of seventy-five barrels capacity.

Our subject was married, in 1885, to Ingeborg E. Lee. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dahl, named as follows: Gerhard; Nora; Elmer, deceased; Inga; Lottie; Elmer and Roy, twins; and Herman. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of May Middleton, and was also a native of England, and was married in Wisconsin.

Our subject grew to manhood in his native place, and after completing his education became a clerk in his father's store, and later secured a position as traveling salesman with Gunther & Hanson, fur hat and cap manufacturers of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in whose employ he continued about eighteen months, and then returned home to take charge of his father's business. He went to Burley county, North Dakota, in 1882, in which place he filed claim to land and engaged in farming thereon for about seven years, at the end of which time he engaged in the mercantile business in Sterling, that county, continuously therein until 1893, when he engaged in the hardware and machine business and conducted the same for five years. He went to Dickey, La Moure county, in March, 1898, and purchased a stock of general merchandise, in which business he has prospered to a remarkable degree and now carries the largest and most complete stock in the northern part of the county.

He has a fine estate and is one of the substantial farmers of his community, and has acquired his property by persistent efforts, and now enjoys the comforts of rural life and is esteemed of his fellowmen.

Our subject was born in Ontario, Canada, November 12, 1857, and was a son of Robert and Margaret (Linton) Cullen. His parents were natives of Scotland and emigrated to America about 1835 and settled in Canada, where the mother still resides. The father was a teamster and died in Canada. They were the parents of eight sons and six daughters, of whom our subject and one brother reside in North Dakota.

Mr. Cullen was reared and educated in Canada and there learned the blacksmith's trade, which he followed four years, and in 1881 went to Cass county, North Dakota, and settled at Fargo, and later moved to Davenport, where he followed his trade until 1889. He then began farming in Norman township and has continued thus engaged since that date and has met with remarkable success, and is now proprietor of a well-improved property including three quarter-sections of land. His residence is a fine brick structure, and he also has substantial barns and other farm buildings on the place and enjoys a comfortable competence from the well-cultivated fields.

He remained in Maine and New Hampshire and was engaged in newspaper work at Great Falls, New Hampshire, as local editor of the "Free Press," and remained in the East until 1880, when he went to Chicago and engaged with the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad Company in the superintendent's office, and taught in the night schools in the meantime. He remained there until May, 1882, and then went to Grand Forks and entered the office of J. G. Hamilton and began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar the following year. In December, 1879, in Cortland county, New York, was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Beattie and Miss Ellen Boynton, a native of Port Perry, Ontario, Canada, and to them has been born one child, Pearl.

EDWARD J. LANDER, one of the well-known business men of Grand Forks, North Dakota, and a member of the firm of E. J. Lander & Co., is engaged in the loan, real estate and abstract business, and has the most complete set of abstract books in the state. He is one of the originators of the Grand Forks Building & Loan Association, and for the last ten years has been its secretary. It was organized in 1886 and is one of the leading financial institutions of the city. He is a man of good business qualifications, and has a wide knowledge of men and the world, and has prospered since taking up his residence here.

Our subject was born in Rockford, Winnebago county, Illinois, September 12, 1860. His parents, Christopher and Jane (Brown) Lander, were natives of England, and came to the United States in 1852 and settled in Rockford, Winnebago county, Illinois, and there the father engaged in milling, where his death occurred in February, 1869.

Mr. Lander is one of three sons now living, and was reared in Illinois and received a high-school education. He then engaged in the grain trade and as a bookkeeper for the Rockford Tack Company, and in 1882 came to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and founded the business in which he is now engaged, the loan business, one of the most extensive of the kind in Grand Forks, which was established in 1882 in farm loans. The firm of E. J. Lander & Company was incorporated in 1897, of which Mr. Lander is president. They have charge of a large number of real estate holdings of non-residents, and are local representatives of E. H. Rollins & Sons, of Boston, Massachusetts.

Mr. Lander was one of the builders of the Grand Forks opera house, and was also one of the original stockholders of the old Second National Bank, and was later a director in that institution and served as vice-president of the same three years. His abstract books are the oldest and most complete to be found in the county, and he has a good business and deals extensively in real estate.

Our subject was married, February 28, 1884, to Miss Jessie K. Krouse, a native of Michigan. One son has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lander, upon whom they have bestowed the name of Miles K. Mr. Lander is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and politically he is a Republican, and has been identified with that party since attaining his majority. He takes an active interest in affairs of a public nature and has held various local offices, including county commissioner, which position he held nine years. He is intelligent and energetic and is deservedly popular with the people.

HON. EMIT S. LOVELACE, who enjoys an extensive business as a general merchant of Fort Ransom, Ransom county, is one of the pioneer business men of that locality. He started with but limited means, and is now the proprietor of a well-equipped establishment, and also owns two hundred and forty acres of land on which his store building stands.

Mr. Lovelace was born in Clark county, Illinois, June 30, 1849, and was the third in a family of eleven children born to Captain Reason L. and Anna M. (Hadden) Lovelace. The father was of English descent and the mother of Scotch-Irish extraction, both descendants of Colonial families.

Our subject was reared to farm labor, and when about eighteen years of age removed to Stearns county, Minnesota, where he engaged in farming. He remained with his father until he was twenty-six years of age, the last two of the time being spent at cabinet work. He then went to Black Hills and prospected for gold there, and spent four years in Montana and Idaho, and then engaged in business in Minnesota, and in the spring of 1881 went to Valley City, Dakota, from where he walked down the Sheyenne river valley to his present location. He had three hundred dollars in money, and formed a partnership with H. Parsons, and they located a small general store in a 14x16 building on our subject's pre-emption claim, about one-half mile east of the present location of his store. In 1875 he had driven cattle across the plains and had then camped at Fort Ransom, where he found pleasant camping grounds and excellent spring water, and on his return to the spot a mill was in course of erection, which decided him in choosing the place for permanent settlement and investment. The store was started with a capital of five hundred dollars, and after a few months our subject became sole proprietor. The store was small, but it was at first thirty-five miles from a railroad station, three years later was reduced to seventeen miles, and was the trading point for the whole country round, and has steadily increased in patronage to the present time. He is extensively interested in valuable mining property in Oregon and Washington.

Our subject was married, in 1894, to Miss Betsy Peterson. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lovelace, as follows: Florence E.; Philip J., deceased; and Nora. Mr. Lovelace is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Modern Woodmen of America and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Republican, and was elected by his party as a state representative in 1896. This was one of the hardest fought political battles of Ransom county, but our subject was favored to the extent of carrying his own township, a strong Populist locality. He is an efficient worker for the advancement of his community, and is highly esteemed by those among whom he has resided for so many years.

FRANK M. BROWN. Stutsman county, North Dakota, is not without her well-regulated farms, and one of these carefully cultivated tracts is the property of the gentleman above named. He is extensively engaged in wheat raising in township 137, range 65, and has met with eminent success in his vocation. He also operates a steam threshing rig, and is the owner of a fine new outfit for this line of work. His home farm is one of the best improved in the locality, and every convenience of modern farming and the newest patterns of machinery are used to facilitate the work.

Our subject was born in Oswego county, New York, in August, 1862. He was raised in his native place on a farm and attended the common schools, and at the age of twenty-one years left home and went to North Dakota. He located at Edgeley, then known as St. George, in the spring of 1884, where he rented land, and he and his brother filed claim to government land. Our subject took the southeast quarter of section 10, in township 137, range 65, and later took as a homestead the northwest quarter of section 10, township 137, range 65. He erected a 12x16-foot shanty in which he lived alone three years, and also built a stable 12x16 feet. His brother took government land on the southwest quarter of section 10, township 137, range 65. Our subject erected a larger dwelling about 1888, and has since built a complete set of farm buildings of the most approved style at a cost of two thousand dollars. He has a convenient residence, barn, two granaries, and all machinery for the economical conduct of the place, and for the past twelve years has operated a threshing outfit and has at present a twenty-horse-power steam rig. He has lost crops by hail and fire and met with many other discouragements, but has been successful in most of his work, and is now one of the substantial men of that region, and is the owner of nine hundred and eighty acres of land, of which he cultivates about seven hundred acres. He has ten acres of forest trees and his place is one of the pleasant farms of the locality.

Our subject was married, in 1888, to Miss Florence L. Hart, of Oswego county, New York. Mrs. Brown's father, A. A. Hart, was of English-Scotch descent, and was a miller by trade. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown, as follows: Eva, born May 11, 1894; and Ella, born March 13, 1899. Mr. Brown is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Democrat, and is a man who keeps pace with the times, and is well known and highly respected in his community.

JOHN POTTNER and his sons, Frank J. and Charlie J., conducting an extensive grain farm in township 148, range 67, in Eddy county, were among the first settlers of that locality, and their present farm bears evidence of careful management and tillage. They have worked together to build up their estate and are now the fortunate owners of a well improved tract. The sons have the management of the place at present and the father is passing his declining years in the enjoyment of the comforts of a pleasant country home.

John Pottner was born in Germany October 1, 1825, and came to America in 1848. He was a butcher by trade and followed that business during the greater part of his career. He located in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and in 1883 came to Eddy county, North Dakota, with his family. He was married, in 1848, to Miss Sabina Frank, and the following children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Pottner: John P., one of the early settlers of North Dakota, and now residing in Minneapolis, Minnesota; Joseph P., a resident also of Minneapolis; George J., residing in Pendleton, Oregon; A. J., engaged in farming in Wells county, North Dakota; Frank J., on the home farm in Eddy county; Charlie J., also on the home farm in Eddy county; Sabina, at home; Thesia, now Mrs. Dave Mattison, of Seattle, Washington; Minnie, now Mrs. Steinbeck; and Mae, at home. The family was among the first settlers of Eddy county to locate in township 148, range 67, and there they erected a claim shanty, 14x24 feet, on government land, to which they had entered claim. After about three weeks a wind and rain storm visited that section and the roof of the shanty was torn off, and after the family had taken refuge in the cellar the entire shanty was blown to pieces. The first crop raised was in 1884, and the following year the crop and ox team, sixty tons of hay, some machinery and the sod stable were destroyed by prairie fire. Drouth killed the crop in 1886 and they lacked one hundred and eight dollars of returning their seed, and also worked for others to pay the threshing. 1887 was a good year and they raised seventeen bushels per acre on three hundred acres; frost destroyed the next year's crop, and frost and drouth affected the yield in 1889, 1890 and 1891 were excellent years for grain raising and 1897 was almost a complete failure year. Such discouragements were met and bravely battled with and Mr. Pottner and sons now have a farm of eleven hundred and twenty acres, with five hundred acres under cultivation. They have a complete set of farm buildings and machinery necessary to the conduct of a model farm. They followed cattle raising extensively from 1886 to 1891 and during the winter of 1891-92 lost seventy head of stock by disease and blizzards. They have lost fifteen head of horses in Dakota, some valued at two hundred dollars. The management of the place is now in the hands of the sons, Frank and Charlie, and they have successfully conducted the farm and carefully look after every interest, while the father does not now have the care and responsibility attached to the work.

The mother, Mrs. Sabina Pottner, died July 17, 1895, at Minneapolis, Minnesota. The family are members of the Catholic church. They are men of strong political views and are identified with all political parties, each in his own belief, and are highly respected throughout that region. Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Pottner will be found on another page.

ABRAHAM ABRAHAMSEN, ex-county treasurer of Grand Forks county, is one of the prominent merchants of Grand Forks, and is well known and highly respected for his energy and integrity.

Our subject was born in Norway, in June, 1853, and is a son of Nels and Lena Abrahamson, both of whom were natives of Norway. The mother died in her native land in 1859 and the father and family came to America and located near Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and later moved to Racine county, Wisconsin. The father died in Grand Forks, North Dakota, in 1894.

Mr. Abrahamson was reared in Wisconsin and remained at home until sixteen years of age, and in 1879 went to North Dakota and located in Traill county, where he entered claim to land and engaged in farming. In June of the same year he went to Grand Forks and purchased a stock of general merchandise and still conducts that business with remarkable success. He was elected county treasurer in 1886 and served eight years, his efficient work and faithfulness commending him to all.

Our subject was married, in 1881, to Bendika Amanson, a native of Norway. One son and two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Abrahamson. Our subject is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He has gradually built up an extensive business in North Dakota and enjoys well-earned success. He is a Republican in political sentiment, and is a man of broad ideas and firm in his convictions. He has a wide knowledge of men and the world and there is no foreign-born citizen of North Dakota who labors more earnestly or has a greater appreciation of the freedom of his adopted land than our subject.

THOMAS C. COMSTOCK, yardmaster for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company at Fargo, North Dakota, and an honored citizen of that place, was born in Fairfield county, Connecticut, May 17, 1850, and is a son of Andrew K. and Emma (Carter) Comstock, also natives of that state. The father, who was a lumber dealer in the East, came to North Dakota in 1880 and settled in Fargo. Later he engaged in farming in Cass county, and died there in 1897. He had two sons, one of whom is now a resident of New York. The paternal grandfather of our subject, Watts Comstock, was also a native of Fairfield county, Connecticut, and was a farmer and banker by occupation.

During his boyhood and youth Thomas C. Comstock attended school and remained in Connecticut until 1868, when he removed to Minnesota and for the following year engaged in clerking in Minneapolis. Later he was in business with his father in the East and there began his railroad career as a civil engineer. Returning to Minneapolis in 1871, he accepted a position on the civil engineering force of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad. The following winter he got out ties for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and in 1872 commenced firing on that road. Later he was promoted to the position of engineer, running a train between Fargo and Duluth, and in 1876 was made a conductor on the same line. Two years later he was transferred to the Dakota division and ran trains between Fargo and Bismarck until 1890, when he was made train yardmaster at the former city. In 1893 he was transferred as trainmaster to Jamestown, but in 1896 returned to Fargo and was given his old position, which he still fills in a most creditable and satisfactory manner. He is now one of the oldest and most trusted employes of the road, and is held in high regard by all who know him. His political support is given the men and measures of the Republican party, but he takes no active part in politics aside from voting.

In 1881 Mr. Comstock married Miss Ellen Merrill, a native of Illinois, and they have three children: Fannie, Arthur and Merrill.

MARTIN SOMDAHL, one of the self-made men and a leading furniture dealer of Valley City, North Dakota, first saw the light of day in the village of Honefoss, Norway, April 25, 1853, and there he attended school until twelve years of age, at the same time acting as messenger boy for Dr. Shjong, one of the foremost physicians of Norway, whose country seat was near Honefoss. Later our subject clerked in a general store and then worked with his step-father at the mason's trade. In the fall of 1869 he commenced painting and followed that pursuit for one year, after which he was in the employ of the Humbledahl & Ringereket Stage Line for a year. In 1870 Mr. Søndahl drifted to Christiania, the chief city of Norway, where he drove a cab for one year, and then accepted a position as driver with the leading liveryman of that place, remaining with him for three years. The following year he was in the employ of the German consul at Christiania, and then went as second waiter on the steamship Olof Kyrre, making two trips to Dronthaim and one to Bergen, after which the boat was laid up. After a short time spent in idleness he secured the position of head waiter on the steamer King Sverre, and the following five years were spent upon steamers. For a short time he was a waiter in the Victoria Hotel, one of the finest on the continent, and next secured a position on the boat King Sigvurd, which plied between Hamburg and Havre. During the winter of 1882 he was head waiter in the St. Olof Club, at Drammen, and from there went to Gottenberg, Sweden, where he worked as waiter for the Thurgard Society for a time. On his return to Christiania he was engaged in the cafe business for a short season.

On the 29th of May, 1883, Mr. Søndahl wedded Miss Mary Ajulldin, a native of Christiania, and on their wedding trip they went to Gottenberg, Sweden, returning to Norway in the fall of that year. For three months he was again engaged in the cafe business at 26-B, Princess street, Christiania, and the following two years was head waiter at Victoria Hotel, Christiania.

On the 16th of April, 1885, Mr. Søndahl and his family sailed for New York, and on landing in this country proceeded at once to Valley City, North Dakota. Here he first engaged in farming and carpentering and in the fall of 1886 became clerk in the general store of Parkhouse & Sales, where his knowledge of the German language was called into service. He remained with that firm for seven years and then embarked in his present business as a furniture dealer. To his own unaided efforts and excellent management may be attributed his success in life for he started out for himself in limited circumstances. Socially, he is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Knights of the Maccabees.

FRANK HERMAN. The estates of Mooreton township, Richland county, have given to that vicinity the name of a thriving agricultural district, and that on which the subject of this review makes his home is among the first of the township. He has resided in North Dakota several years, and has displayed a knowledge of his calling which entitles him to a foremost rank among the agriculturists of his community. He has conducted a farm in section 18 since taking up his work in the western state and has met with success, and is surrounded by all the comforts of a country home.

Mr. Herman was born at Grass Lake, Lake county, Illinois, August 14, 1871, and was the son of Andrew and Mary (Scholl) Herman. His parents were natives of Germany.

Our subject was reared in his native county and educated in the common schools, and assisted his father with the farm work. He remained in Lake county until taking up his residence in North Dakota in 1893. He settled on the farm where he now lives in Mooreton township, and operates three quarter-sections of land which he rents of his brother A. F. Herman. While not one of the largest estates in the vicinity, he has made it equal to any in point of yield in proportion to size, and the appearance of the entire estate is one of thrift and evidences the painstaking care exercised in the work.

Mr. Herman was married at Wilmot, Wisconsin, December 8, 1892, to Miss Ella Bartling, daughter of Fred Bartling, of Lake county, Illinois. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Herman, as follows: Frank, Clarence, Edward, and Leo. They are an intelligent group of boys and complete a pleasant family circle.

Mr. Herman is a gentleman of good education and practical business methods, and has gained an enviable reputation for his honesty and industry. He is one of the rising young men of North Dakota, and well merits his success and good name. The vocation to which he has devoted his life is one of which he has a thorough knowledge, having received a rich heritage, his father following that occupation before him, and instilling into his son the essential qualifications for success. The young men of a community are the ones to whom the men of declining years must look for impetus to the work, and in such a gentleman as the subject of this review is to be found every trait of character desired. To such can safely be entrusted the future of the state and nation.

OLE ARNEGARD, a member of the firm of Arnegard & Lofthus, hardware dealers of Hillsboro, North Dakota, is one of the rising young men of his community. He went to North Dakota in his early youth and has become a thorough citizen of that state and earnestly works for its social interests. He is an able business man, and is interested extensively in farming in Norway township, being one of the early settlers of that locality.

Our subject was born in Rice county, Minnesota, September 22, 1869, and was the eldest of nine children born to Ole O. and Marit (Knutson) Arnegard, both of whom were natives of Norway. The father emigrated to America in 1860 and served in the Civil war in Company G, Eighth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, for one and a half years. He was married to Marit Knutson in 1868. The family moved to Norway township, Traill county, North Dakota, in 1878, where Mr. Arnegard died in 1896. The mother passed away in 1886.

Our subject went to North Dakota with his parents and followed the breaking plow drawn by oxen for several seasons. During the winter of 1888-89 he attended Willmar Seminary and completed a three-years course in a business and academic course, and in the spring of 1892 taught one term of school. In the fall of that year he entered the University of North Dakota at Grand Forks, and graduated with the class of 1896. He then spent two years conducting his father's farm, as he was administrator, and he is now in possession of the homestead farm, which is fully improved. It is located in the Goose River valley and from eighty acres of abundant timber he sells elm, ash, oak and box elder. He owns four hundred and seventy acres of choice land in Norway township and his farm is under cultivation and furnishes a good income. The present firm of Arnegard & Loftus was established in January, 1899, succeeding to the old established business of P. L. Prichard. Mr. Arnegard worked two seasons as expert machinist for Harvester, King & Company, and a salesman for the Deering Harvester Company.

Mr. Arnegard is a member of the Lutheran church, and of the Knights of Pythias, and in political sentiment is a Republican. He is a gentleman of rare ability and intelligence and was elected trustee of Grand Forks College in 1899.

INGEBREGT MOUM. Among the foreign-born citizens of Cass county who are thoroughly identified with American progress, may be noted Mr. Moum. He owns an excellent farm comprising one section of land, in Ayr township, where the usual improvements have been made, and such arrangements completed as to make it a comfortable home.

Our subject was born in Norway, June 11, 1849, and was a son of Bertel and Ane (Kjelmoen) Moum, who were natives of Norway. His father was a farmer by occupation and died in his native land. Five sons and three daughters constituted the family of children of which our subject was a member, and he and one sister, Mrs. Thompson, reside in Cass county, and are the only ones of the family in the United States.

Mr. Moum was reared in Norway and received his education there, and in 1866 came to America, locating in St. Croix county, Wisconsin, where he remained until 1874 and then spent one year in Duluth, Minnesota, and then went to New Mexico. He was employed there three years herding sheep, and during his stay there visited the neighboring town but once. He went to Cass county, North Dakota, in 1879, and entered a homestead claim to land in section 34, of Ayr township, where he has since resided, and now owns a pleasant home. He broke forty acres of land and built a house the first fall and now has a well-improved estate and cultivates one section of land with remarkable success.

Our subject was married, in 1879, to Miss Josephine Peterson, a native of Norway, who came to America in 1875. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Moum, named as follows: Annie J. and Philip B. Mr. Moum is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Brotherhood of American Yeomen. During the early part of his service he took part in all the important battles in which that command was engaged, but after the battle of Gettysburg was transferred to the Army of the Cumberland, with which he remained until honorably discharged at Washington, D. He disposed of his business in 1866 and entered a partnership with Archibald McKillop in the sawmill business, which they followed four years. He then spent one year clerking in Iverness, Quebec, and then removed to Lowell, Massachusetts, and entered the employ of the Merimac Print Works as timekeeper, which position he filled two years, and then became manager of one of the departments of the business, which office he held seven years. He purchased a farm in Floyd county, Iowa, in 1880, and began farming, and after three years disposed of the property at a good advance of purchasing price and bought two carloads of horses, which he shipped to Carrington, North Dakota. His parents were natives of Ireland and the father was born in 1801. He was a farmer by occupation and died in Ingham county, Michigan, at the age of seventy-eight years, and the mother died in the same state in 1889.

When a child of two and a half years our subject was taken to Washtenaw county, Michigan, where he attended school and later moved to Ingham county, that state, where the family resided near the village of Stockbridge. He remained at home until he attained his majority, when he learned the blacksmith's trade in the village and followed the same in Stockbridge until the spring of 1884, when he went to Dickey county, North Dakota. He entered claim to the southeast quarter of section 34, township 131, range 65, which land he now owns, and his home farm comprises three quarter-sections of land. On this he has placed valuable improvements and his barn is the best structure of the kind in the locality, if not in the southern counties of the state. He has sixty-five head of well graded Durham cattle and thirteen head of good work horses.

Our subject was married in Stockbridge, Michigan, in 1877, to Miss Helen Kellogg, a native of Ingham county and a daughter of Benjamin Kellogg. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Graham, the eldest and youngest of whom died in infancy. The two surviving children are named as follows: Fred J. and Ethel. JOSEPH H. WILCOX, one of the pioneer settlers of Ayr township, is widely known as an agriculturist of industrious habits and excellent character. He and his brother, William J. Wilcox, now deceased, located land in the early days of the settlement there and struggled together to make a comfortable home and a good income for future years, and the present thriving condition of their farms bears evidence of their successful efforts.

Our subject was born in Dodge county, Wisconsin, February 2, 1854, and was a son of David and Charlotte (Bowser) Wilcox, who were natives of Lincolnshire, England. They were farmers by occupation and the father also operated a canal boat. The family came to the United States in 1849 and settled in Dodge county, Wisconsin, where the father purchased land and cleared up a farm, and still resides in that county. Five sons and one daughter were born to them, and the daughter and our subject are the only members of the family now in North Dakota.

Mr. Wilcox was reared in Dodge county, Wisconsin, and in 1879, in company with his brother, William J., notice of whom appears below, he went to Cass county, North Dakota, and entered claim to the southwest quarter of section 32, in Ayr township, as a homestead, and became one of the first settlers of the township. They began the improvements at once, and our subject now has one of the finest farms of that locality, and cultivates two quarter-sections.

Our subject was married, March 4, 1880, to Miss Minnie E. Muhlmer, a native of Dodge county, Wisconsin. Mrs. Wilcox is a daughter of John and Louise (Scroeder) Muhlmer, natives of Germany, who came to America in 1855 and settled in Dodge county, Wisconsin. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wilcox, as follows: David J., Edith M., Byron J., Luella B., Charles E. and Ernest L. Mr. Wilcox assisted in the organization of his township and served on the board for many years, and was also chairman of the town board. He is a member of the Brotherhood of American Yeomen and is popular with the people. Politically he is a Republican.

Mr. Wilcox was married in Wisconsin, March 17, 1881, to Louise P. Muhlmer, a sister of Mrs.

Joseph Wilcox. Our subject died March 20, 1894, leaving his wife and five children, as follows: Evelyn L., Ira William, Clara A., George H. and Chester A. Mr. Wilcox was prominent in local affairs and served as township treasurer and assessor. He held membership in the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Our subject left the home farm when thirteen years of age and went to Minnesota, where he remained a few years, and then went to Colorado, and there engaged in mining several years. He went to Griggs county, North Dakota, in the fall of 1880, and the following year settled at Cooperstown. He platted the town which bears his name, and at once engaged in farming and grain buying. He has added to his acreage from time to time and is now one of the most extensive land owners of the state, and engages in grain raising.

Mr. Cooper was married in Colorado, in 1870, to Miss Emma C. Hutchin, a native of Ohio and a daughter of Henry and Ella Hutchin. Mr. Cooper has served his community in various important positions, and has always been found standing firmly for right and justice, and performing his duties faithfully and with commendable public spirit. He was elected to the house of representatives in 1894, and to the senate in 1898, and served one term in each office. In the house he was chairman of the railroad committee, and was also a member of other committees, and he was a member of the first board of county commissioners of Griggs county, being appointed in that capacity by Governor Ordway during territorial days. He purchased an interest in the general merchandise business with Mr. Wamberg in March, 1883, and after his employment as grain buyer turned his attention to the mercantile business. They own fourteen hundred acres of land in various parts of Steele county, and are successful farmers and business men.

He taught school for about three years, and in the spring of 1878 went to North Dakota and traveled through that state and Minnesota by team with a companion. During the summer of that year he filed a claim to the southwest quarter of section 6 in Eldorado township, where his buildings now stand. He rented his farm in 1891, and moved to Coopers-town, North Dakota, where he purchased residence property and resided one year, and in 1892 went to Courtenay and built the first livery barn in that village, which he rented out, and later built a small building in which he conducted the implement business. Cooper, and in the spring of 1898 they added a stock of furniture, and also conduct the undertaking business. WINFIELD S. STAMBAUGH, attorney-at-law, has been a resident of Fargo a short time comparatively, but has gained an enviable reputation as a man of practical nature and sound mind. He is junior member of the firm of Newman, Spalding & Stambaugh, and has become well-known in that locality.

Our subject was born in Plymouth, Ohio, March 10, 1852, and was one of two sons born to David W. and Rachel (Wyandt) Stambaugh, natives respectively of Pennsylvania and Ohio. His father was a lawyer and practiced many years at New Philadelphia, and died in 1869. He was county attorney for many years and a member of the state senate at the time of his death. Of his two sons the brother of our subject died in 1874.

He began the study of law soon after locating in Kansas, and was admitted to practice in all courts in 1874. He read law with Judge John H. Mahon, of the court of appeals, and began the practice of the profession with him in 1875, which partnership continued two years. Mr. Stambaugh then practiced alone until 1879, when he became associated with G. W. Hurd, and the firm of Stambaugh & Hurd continued until our subject left Kansas. He went to Fargo, North Dakota, in January, 1898, and entered partnership with the firm above named.

Our subject was married, in 1885, to Miss Linda G. Upshaw, a native of Illinois. Two sons have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Stambaugh, as follows: Scott and Lynn. JOHN SIMONS. There are in every community men of great force of character and exceptional ability, who by reason of their capacity for leadership become recognized as foremost citizens, and bear a most important part in the development and progress of the locality with which they are connected. Such a man is Mr. Simons, who is prominently identified with the business interests of Valley City, and is also serving as chairman of the North Dakota Railway Commission.

He was born in Walworth county, Wisconsin, April 27, 1858, a son of Simon O. and Line Olive Simons, both natives of Norway. The father was born in 1816 and died in Wisconsin in 1861, but the mother is still living and finds a pleasant home with our subject. When a child of six years he accompanied the family on their removal to Dakota county, Minnesota, where he grew to manhood upon a farm. During his youth he clerked in a store for a time.

In 1878 Mr. Simons came to Fargo, North Dakota, and the following year took up his residence in Valley City, where he at once embarked in the farm machinery business. Here he has since continued to carry on operations with the exception of four years spent in Superior, Wisconsin, to which place he removed in 1890. There he engaged in the hardware business, and in 1892 and 1893 served as chief of police in that city, having at times forty or fifty officers under him. He creditably filled that position during the most stirring times in the history of that place. In December, 1893, he returned to Valley City and resumed his former business, in which he has met with marked success.

In 1885 Mr. Simons led to the marriage altar Miss Annie Omnes, of Minnesota, and they now have four children, Elsie, Walter H., Cora and Norman, all born in Valley City.

Mr. Simons has been honored with a number of public positions of trust and responsibility. He served as sheriff of Barnes county from 1884 until 1890, and held the office of United States deputy marshal here in early days. He has been a member of the penitentiary committee for one term, and in 1898 was elected to his present office, that of chairman of the railway committee, which he is now filling in a most commendable and satisfactory manner.

RALPH E. MOREHOUSE. While the pioneers of the country are the men who mold her destiny, it remains for the rising generation to carry the work to its desired conclusion, and one of the rising young men of Steele county, North Dakota, who is fitting himself for this great work is the gentleman above named. He has begun a career of usefulness, and is persevering, studious, and possessed of those traits of character which distinguish the worthy citizen and man of business possibilities. The Morhouse family is of Holland and the Thurston family of English lineage, and both families settled in the state of New York, prior to the Revolution, and both families were represented in that war. Our subject's father fought four years in the Civil war. He enlisted in 1861 as a member of Company K, First Wisconsin Infantry, and re-enlisted the same year in Company G of the Twenty-ninth Wisconsin Infantry. Most of his service was on the Mississippi. He was mustered out in 1865 and received an honorable discharge. Mr. Morehouse was the fourth in a family of six children and received a liberal education. After completing the studies of the Mitchell high school he went to Hope, North Dakota, in 1896, and began the study of law, with his brother-in-law, T. J. McMahon. A portion of his time is devoted to collecting and bookkeeping work for Dr. Philip of that city, and he also teaches school during the winter months.

Mr. Morehouse is a young man who keeps posted on all matters of public importance, and has a bright future in North Dakota. He is a member of the Brotherhood of American Yeoman. In political sentiment he is independent.

JOHN CHEZIK. What can be accomplished by persistent industry and strict attention to business is exemplified in the life of the subject of this review, who is one of the leading and well-to-do citizens of Summit township, Richland county. He makes his home on section 6, and is engaged in the pursuit of agriculture.

Our subject was born in Bohemia, about 1837. He was reared on a farm in his native land, and remained there until the fall of 1860 when he came to America. He remained in Baltimore a short time and then went direct to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where he stayed until the fall of 1861. He then went to Grant county, Wisconsin, and was engaged at farm labor for about seven years, after which he purchased a farm in Iowa county, Wisconsin, and engaged in farming for himself. He remained thus until the spring of 1881, when he went to Dakota, entering a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 6, in Summit township, where he has since made his home. He now owns one quarter-section of land, and on his home farm has erected a comfortable residence and other farm buildings, and is surrounded by the comforts of country life. His two children, Mary M. and Anthony R., each own a quarter-section of land adjoining their father's.

Our subject was married in Grant county, Wisconsin, November 18, 1865, to Miss Mary Kopshever, who was born in Bohemia, in March, 1844. Mrs. Chezik came to America with her parents in 1857. Ten children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Chezik, two of whom died in infancy. The surviving children bear the following names: John J., Mary M., Joseph A., Stasia B., Anthony R., Fred, Rose C. and George R.

ISAAC N. WEAR, M. D., of whom a portrait will be found in this volume, is one of the most successful physicians of North Dakota and a prominent resident of Fargo. He has much natural ability, but is withal a close student and believes thoroughly in the maxim "there is no excellence without labor." His devotion to the duties of his profession, therefore, combined with a comprehensive understanding of the principles of the science of medicine, has made his a most successful and able practitioner, whose prominence is well deserved.

The Doctor was born in McDonough county, Illinois, March 25, 1852, a son of Joseph D. and Mary (Downs) Wear, natives of Tennessee and Indiana, respectively. The grandfather, Hugh Wear, was born in Virginia and was a planter of that state prior to his removal to Knoxville, Tennessee. Later he became a resident of Illinois, where he took up government land, and in that state he died at the age of eighty-four years. The father of our subject, who was a farmer by occupation, also died in Illinois at the age of eighty-one. In his family were five sons, four of whom are still living.

Dr. Wear acquired his literary education at Abingdon, Illinois, and for six years successfully engaged in teaching school in that state, being made principal of the Plymouth schools at the early age of twenty years. While thus employed he commenced the study of medicine and in 1876 entered Rush Medical College, Chicago, from which he was graduated in 1878. For four years he engaged in the practice of his chosen profession at Fandon, Illinois, and in the meantime took a post graduate course at Rush in 1880.

In 1882 Dr. Wear came to Fargo, North Dakota, where he has since made his home, enjoying a large and lucrative practice. In 1890 he went to Europe and visited the hospitals of London, Paris and Germany, remaining abroad three months, and in 1897, in company with Prof. Senn and Prof. George R. Fowler, of New York, visited Rome and Athens, the Constantinople military hospitals, Vienna, Buda Pest, Moscow, St. Petersburg and the hospitals of Stockholm and Christiania. In this way he has become familiar with the different methods of caring for suffering humanity in all countries and has adopted those customs and practices which he believes to be the best. This, together with the love he bears for his profession, has been the secret of his great success. For eight years, up to 1898, he was assisted in his work by Dr. Campbell, and in May, 1899, he took in as his assistant Dr. Wheeler, which connection still exists. Dr. Wear is a member of the American Medical Association, the North Dakota State Medical Society and an honorary member of the Minnesota State Medical Society. He is now serving as president of the North Dakota state medical board of examiners and is ex-president of the North Dakota State Medical Society, and devotes his entire time and attention to his professional duties.

Dr. Wear was married, in 1888, to Miss Lula Thomas, a daughter of Judge Thomas, who is represented elsewhere in this volume. Socially the Doctor is a thirty-second-degree Mason and a member of the Knights of Pythias. Travel and his social, genial nature have made him an entertaining companion and he is a staunch and loyal friend, fond of good fellowship and devoted to those who have his confidence. It should be mentioned in this connection that Dr. Ware is local examining physician for the New York Life Insurance Company, Mutual Life of New York, Equitable Life of New York, Germania Life, Pennsylvania Mutual, Home, Northwestern Mutual of Milwaukee, Union Central of Cincinnati, Ohio, and Travelers Life. He is an early settler of that region and has improved his own estate and aided in bringing about the present solid prosperity enjoyed in Sargent county. He makes his home on section 25 and every arrangement for the convenience or comfort of the family has been provided.

Rev. Mr. Andersen was born in the country village Ytteren, in Hegeland, Norway, July 9, 1856. He followed fishing and sailing in his native land, and when twenty years of age came to America, and worked in Minnesota about three years. He then took up the classical and theological courses at Angohing College and Theological Seminary, later completing his studies in Chicago at Dr. Widener's Theological Seminary, when he was ordained to the ministry in 1887, and at once went to Ransom county, Dakota. He had charge of the Standing Rock congregation and five others in Ransom, LaMoure and Barnes counties, all of which were without church buildings. He now has charge of three congregations, and two of them have erected churches, and the third is to erect a house of worship in the near future. Standing Rock congregation was organized in 1882, by Rev. J. L. Lundebey, who was followed by Rev. L. C. Hill, who in turn was followed by the present pastor, Rev. Mr. Andersen. Upon his arrival in Ransom county the congregation consisted of sixty families, and now numbers one hundred families. A church building was erected in 1890, and was completed and dedicated in 1898. It is located in Fort Ransom, and the building is an imposing structure, 50x32 feet, with a vestry 24x16 feet. The spire extends eighty feet from the ground. Mr. Andersen's farm comprises eighty acres of land along the river, and is a pleasant home.

Our subject was born on a farm in Erie county, Pennsylvania, June 8, 1854. His father, W. W. Covell, was of English descent and was a farmer throughout his career. The great-grandfather of our subject, James Covell, served in the Revolutionary war. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Ellen E. Barber, was of English descent and her family settled in Rhode Island in colonial times.

Mr. Covell was the fourth in a family of seven children and attended the country schools and took an academic course and began reading law in 1877 and was admitted to the bar in 1880 in Pennsylvania. A partnership was then formed with his brother, C. L. Covell, and he remained with him two years and in 1883 came to North Dakota and located at Carrington and began the practice of his profession, in which he continued there three years. He located at Sykeston in 1886 and practiced law exclusively three years and during 1888-1889 was postmaster at Sykeston. He established a general store in 1890 and now conducts one of the most extensive business concerns of that city. JOHN A. KLOVSTAD. The lands beyond the sea have sent their full quota of energetic and industrious men to Steele county, North Dakota, and many have won honorable stations as citizens and business men, winning their way amid the disadvantages attending a stranger in a strange land. Among these is the subject of this review. He has resided in America many years and has thoroughly acquainted himself with American customs and methods and is well known and highly respected in Steele county, where he has been engaged in grain buying for many years and he has a handsome residence in the city of Hope.

Our subject was born in Kongsberg, Norway, September 2, 1860, and was the second in a family of seven children born to Andrew S. and Anna O. (Warket) Klovstad, both of whom are deceased. He came to America with his father and eldest brother in 1870, when ten years of age, and after landing at New York City, they at once made their way to Stevens Point, Wisconsin, where our subject secured a position almost immediately with a physician, for whom he worked two years for his board and clothes and attended school regularly during the time. He and his father and brother went to Dodge county, Minnesota, in 1875, and there engaged in farming and in 1880 a home was made in Chippewa county and the same year the mother and the other children of the family joined them. Our subject went to Dakota in 1890 and entered the employ of the Red River Valley Elevator Company and was stationed as the agent at Hope. The company failed in about three years and our subject about the same time accepted a position as grain buyer for the Northwestern Elevator Company at Hope. He has prospered as a business man and possesses a fine residence property in the city as the result of his earnings.

Our subject was married, in 1894, to Miss Mayma B. Laramore. Two children have been born to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Klovstad, who bear the names of Annie E. L. and Ralph W. Mr. Klovstad is a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and in the first named has passed the thirty-second degree. In political sentiment he is a Democrat and is firm in his convictions.

WILBUR F. CHAPMAN. This gentleman is the fortunate owner of one of the fine estates of Ayr township, Cass county, and is well known as a pioneer settler of that locality. He has devoted his attention wholly to his farm work and has become well-to-do and also gained an enviable station among his fellows.

Our subject was born in Youngstown, Ohio, September 26, 1848, and was a son of Wells A. and Catherine (Mercer) Chapman, who were natives of Ohio. His father was a stock dealer and went to Wisconsin in 1849 and both parents died at Fox Lake, that state. They were the parents of four sons and three daughters, our subject being the only one now in North Dakota.

Mr. Chapman was reared in Wisconsin and received his education there and remained in that state until 1879, when he went to Cass county, North Dakota, with his brother, Homer M. He homesteaded on section 30 in Ayr township, and he and his brother were among the earliest settlers of that locality. He has resided there since that date and is now the owner of one half-section of land, all of which is well improved and furnishes a comfortable income.

Our subject was married, in 1881, in Wisconsin, to Martha Davies, a native of Wisconsin. Mrs. Chapman's parents, John H. and Mary J. (Perry) Davies, were natives of Wales and Canada, respectively. Her father emigrated to America in 1843 and died in Wisconsin. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Chapman, as follows: Katherine J. and Jay W. He is a member of the Brotherhood of American Yoemen and in political sentiment is a Republican.

HOMER M. CHAPMAN, deceased, brother of Wilbur F. Chapman, was a prominent farmer of Ayr township for many years and met with success in his vocation. He was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, March 9, 1841, and went to Wisconsin with his parents. He enlisted, March 7, 1865, in Company A, Fifty-first Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was in the Army of the Potomac in Virginia. He served until the close of the war and was discharged from the service August 22, 1865, with the rank of corporal.

Mr. Chapman went to Dakota with his brother in 1870 and homesteaded on section 30 in Ayr township, Cass county, where he resided until his death, which occurred January 20, 1900. Our subject was married, December 7, 1882, at Watertown, Wisconsin, to Elizabeth Prentice. Mr. Chapman was one of the organizers of the township and actively interested in the general welfare of his community, but never sought or filled public office, devoting his time to the operation of his farm and met with remarkable success in his vocation. He was mourned by a large circle of friends as a true citizen, worthy the esteem of his fellow men.

JOHN LUBENOW. Among the foreign born residents of Richland county, North Dakota, who are thoroughly identified with American civilization and progress may be noted this gentleman. He owns a fine estate in section 7, of Summit township, where the usual improvements have been made and such arrangements consummated as make it a comfortable home.

The following children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lubenow: Louisa, John, Lina, Albert, Richard, William and Fred. Mr. Lubenow is thoroughly conversant with the details of his calling and a visit to his farm at once convinces one of his industry and careful methods. He uses modern machinery and otherwise lessens the labors incident to farm work. He is held in the highest esteem by his associates and is entitled to much credit for the part he has taken in the present thriving condition of that vicinity.

NICHOLAS SCHMITT. Among the better class of agriculturists of Richland county, North Dakota, who have given to that district fame as a thriving farming country, may well be named the gentleman whose life history is here presented. He has worked earnestly for the advancement of his community and his fine estate has done much to further the interests of that region. He makes his home on section 14, in Summit township, and is one of the early settlers of that locality.

Our subject was born in Fond du Lac county, Wisconsin, December 6, 1855. His mother died when he was but five years of age and at the age of ten years he was called upon to mourn his father's death. He began to earn his own livelihood at the age of thirteen years and while a mere boy worked in the factories in Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, for about three years, afterward going to northern Michigan. He worked there in the copper mines two years and then returned to Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, where he learned the blacksmith's trade, following that occupation in Fond du Lac county and at St. Cloud, Wisconsin, for about two years. He engaged in the cheese business in St. Cloud one year and in July, 1879, went to Dakota and entered a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 3, in Summit township, which he afterward traded for a quarter-section on section 10 of the same township. He there conducted farming four years and then rented his land and engaged in the hotel business in Breckenridge, Minnesota, two years, returning to his farm at the end of that time. He is now the owner of four hundred acres of land and has added substantial improvements to his farm.

Our subject was married, in Wahpeton, North Dakota, April 30, 1881, to Miss Elizabeth Moersch, who was born in Fond du Lac county, Wisconsin, November 1, 1863. Mrs. Schmitt died at St. Paul, while en route to a hospital, October 10, 1898.

HENRY BIERMANN is one of the leading and influential farmers of Traill county, wherein he is a large land owner. His farm is in section 22 of Eldorado township, and his residence is located on the northeast quarter. He has been successful as an agriculturist, but many years were spent in a seemingly fruitless struggle for the accumulation of a comfortable home. He lived in his first log house for many years and labored with untiring energy, his efforts being rewarded by the acquisition of a fine property and a high station as a citizen.

Our subject was born in Nemberg, Germany, July 10, 1847, and was the younger of two children born to Henry and Mary (Patrosen) Biermann. His mother died in 1853 and in 1859 the father with his two children crossed the ocean and arrived in New Orleans shortly before Christmas and there took a steamer up the Mississippi river to St. Louis and there visited an uncle of our subject. The father began farming in St. Louis county, Missouri, and after a few years remarried.

Although but fourteen years of age our subject enlisted, August 14, 1861, in Company G, Twelfth Missouri Volunteer Infantry. Pea Ridge was the first engagement and then followed Vicksburg, Chattanooga, Lookout Mountain and the battle of Atlanta and the capture of Atlanta, and then he marched with Sherman to the sea and then northward and participated in the grand review at Washington. He took part in some of the hardest-fought engagements and though but a boy proved himself loyal to the cause of his adopted land. He was home but eight days during his long and hard service and most of the time was actively engaged at the front. He was mustered out September 3, 1864, and afterward worked in Missouri at farm labor. He went to Cook county, Illinois, in 1867 and followed farm work and about 1870 returned to Missouri and from there, in the fall of 1878, went to Dakota, arriving at Fargo with thirty dollars and a few household goods. His father-in-law had preceded him to the Goose river country and he took land as near him as could be found and erected a 16x24-foot shanty. He incurred debts in getting farm machinery and teams and his second crop was destroyed by prairie fire. He now owns four hundred acres of plow land and ten acres of timber and on his home farm has erected a large barn and comfortable residence and enjoys country life.

Our subject was married, December 17, 1870, to Miss Augusta Housemann. Eleven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Biermann, as follows: William; Louisa; John; Katie, deceased; Henry; Amelia; Emile; Hammon, deceased; Henrietta; Carl, deceased, and Alfred. The parents of our subject, William and Jane (Plowman) Anderson, were both natives of Canada and the father was a shoe dealer and maker and died in Ontario.

Our subject is the only son and was reared and educated in Le Sueur county, Minnesota, going there with his mother, and in 1862, on account of the Indian troubles in Minnesota, they removed to St. Paul, where Mr. Anderson attended the public schools. He followed various callings until 1875, when he came to Grand Forks, North Dakota, as agent for the Red River Transportation Company and the following year was elected justice of the peace and continued with the transportation company until 1879 and the following year was appointed receiver of the land office. He opened the office April 20, 1880, and worked in that capacity eight years and then began the study of law and was admitted to the bar about 1887. He was elected county auditor in 1888 and served four years and was an efficient and popular public official. He was elected mayor of Grand Forks in 1890, and served two years and he always proved himself worthy the confidence placed in him by the people. He has a good business in the practice of his profession and his integrity and knowledge of his calling entitle him to a high station as a professional man and citizen.

Our subject was married, in 1879, to Josephine Russell, a native of Wisconsin. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Anderson, named Raymond G. and Virginia E. Mr. Anderson is a member of the Masonic fraternity, being a Knight Templar, and he also holds membership in the Knights of Pythias, of which order he is deputy grand chancellor. Politically, he is a Republican and has been identified with the movements of that party during his entire career. JOHN P. HOAGLAND is an honored pioneer and a prominent contractor and builder of Bismarck, who has taken an active part in promoting its substantial improvement and material development. An adopted son of America, his loyalty is above question and his labors in the interests of the city have been most effective and beneficial. Mr. Hoagland was born in central Sweden October 20, 1840, a son of John and Mary Hoagland, who spent their entire lives in that country.

Our subject was reared to manhood in his native land and there learned the carpenter's trade, which he followed in Sweden until 1868, when he emigrated to America, landing in Quebec, Canada. He proceeded at once to Red Wing, Minnesota, and remained in that state until coming to Bismarck, in 1873, arriving here in May, of that year, on the first train run into the place. For two days and a half he had stopped some miles out of Bismarck, waiting for the track to be completed.

Here Mr. Hoagland found employment at his trade and soon went to work on Fort Lincoln, which was then being built, remaining there until its completion. The Indians at that time were very troublesome and our subject had several exciting adventures with them, being chased to the fort by small war parties. At one time, in company with a number of other carpenters employed there, he left the fort one bright Sunday morning in search of wild berries, as fruit of all kinds was very scarce and even potatoes were considered quite a luxury. They had gone, perhaps, a mile from the post and had found an abundance of June berries in a small ravine. After eating all they were able to dispose of, they lay around on the grass enjoying the sunshine and passing the time by shooting at blackbirds with their revolvers. By the merest chance Mr. Hoagland happened to look up over the hills and discovered a large band of Indians stealthily approaching them. As our subject and his party were only armed with revolvers, their only safety lay in flight. With the others he ran in close pursuit by the Indians for perhaps a half-mile and then concealed himself in a patch of brush where he was soon joined by the rest of the party. They remained in hiding there for some time and then cautiously made their way by a circuitous route back to the fort. Mr. Hoagland says he was never so badly scared in his life and it required some time for his heart to resume its normal action.

In 1876 he assisted in building the fort at Standing Rock, where he was employed for about two years, the lumber for its construction being sawed from cottonwood logs cut on the river bottom. When that work was completed he returned to Bismarck, where he has since engaged in contracting and building with marked success, and also conducts a lumber yard. He has assisted in building most of the leading business houses of the city, including the First National Bank building, the Center block and the Dakota block. In connection with his other business he has also engaged in farming to some extent. Upright and reliable in all things, he conscientiously fulfills his part of every contract and is an important factor in the business circles of the city. Through his own well-directed efforts he has become the owner of a handsome property. He takes a deep and commendable interest in public affairs and does all in his power to advance the interests of his adopted city, giving two thousand dollars toward getting the capitol located at Bismarck. In political sentiment he is a Republican. He was elected county treasurer on an independent ticket, but was re-elected as a Republican, serving in all four years with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of the public. A portrait of Mr. Hoagland will be found on another page.

CHRIS H. ANHEIER, cashier of the Citizens' National Bank, is a man of excellent business qualifications and broad ideas and enjoys the confidence and esteem of a large circle of business and social friends. He was born in St. Croix county, Wisconsin, March 11, 1858, and was the son of William and Margaret (Moskop) Anheier.

The parents of our subject were natives of Germany and came to the United States about 1848, and were married in southern Illinois, where they resided for some time and then moved to Wisconsin, and from there, in 1864, to Minneapolis, where they still live, the father retired from active labors.

Our subject was one of two sons and the only one of the family in North Dakota. He was reared and educated in Minneapolis, where he remained with his father in the milling business until 1880, when he went to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and in 1881 went to Fargo as elevator manager and bought wheat one year and then was engaged as engineer for the city water works for a short time. He soon afterward engaged again in the elevator business and in 1886 was elected auditor of Cass county, on what was known as the farmers' ticket. He was re-elected in 1890 and again in 1892 and in the fall of 1895 was appointed bank examiner and served until July 1, 1898. During that time he was receiver of the Grand Forks National Bank for five months and in January, 1897, was appointed receiver of the Citizens' National Bank, of Fargo, which office he is now filling.

Our subject was married, in 1886, to Miss Kate Schulte, a native of Minnesota. The following children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Anheier: Harry W., Clarence M., Carl, Marie and Walter. Mr. Anheier is a member of the Order of Foresters, of which order he is chief ranger. He is also a member of the Zodiac, recently organized, and is the executive officer of that order. He served as county judge for a short period during the absence of Judge Roberts and is one of the most prominent men of Fargo and keenly alive to the welfare of that thriving city. He has been associated with the Democratic party since he attained his majority and is an ardent worker for the principles of that organization.

FRANK J. BURNHAM, one of the influential citizens of Carrington, Foster county, near where he conducts an extensive farm, is one of the enterprising and well-to-do citizens of that region. He was born in St. Albans, Vermont, December 18, 1851, and is a son of G. B. and Augusta (Trusell) Burnham. His father was of English descent and his ancestors came from England in colonial times. He was a mason during his career and the grandfather of our subject was a farmer in Vermont. The mother of our subject was born in New Hampshire and her father was a native of England.

Mr. Burnham is the oldest in a family of three children and was raised in his native place and at the age of twelve years removed with his parents to High Gate, Vermont, where he lived six years. He learned his father's trade and at the age of twenty years started for himself. He worked at his trade four years in Vermont, after which he did contract work for himself twelve years, part of the time in New Hampshire. He came to Dakota in March, 1883, and entered claim to government land, the southwest quarter of section 30, in township 145, range 66, as a pre-emption, but later turned his claim to a homestead and he also took land as a tree claim. He erected a 16x24 house, the first building of any size in the locality, and this was a familiar landmark and could be seen many miles. He is now the owner of nine hundred and sixty acres of land, about half of which is under cultivation, and he has ten acres of forest trees and a complete set of excellent farm buildings, among the best in the county, and keeps sixty head of cattle and twenty head of horses on the place. He manages the farm himself, but has a tenant on the place. He erected a substantial and commodious residence in Carrington in the summer of 1868, since which time he has made his home there. He has worked at his trade in Carrington and all of the largest and best constructed dwellings he has worked on.

Our subject was married, in Vermont, December 6, 1873, to Miss Emma Rorabaugh, who was born and raised in Duncannon, Pennsylvania. Mrs. Burnham's father, Daniel Rorabaugh, is of German descent and is a prosperous farmer of Iowa. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Burnham, as follows: George, Chilo and Pluma. Mr. Burnham is active in local affairs of a public nature and has held various offices in his township. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically, he is a Republican.

HON. JOHN. W. SCOTT, auditor of Grand Forks county, has served in that capacity many years and is one of the best known and most highly esteemed officials of the county. He is efficient, faithful and possessed of true Americanism and his high standing and enviable reputation is well merited. For some years he has been identified with the agricultural interests of Grand Forks county, and still owns a large and well-improved estate in this county. He owns nine hundred acres in the township of Gilby.

Our subject was born in Ontario, Canada, October 21, 1849, and is a son of George and Elizabeth (Noyes) Scott. His father was a native of Ireland and came to America about 1825 and his death occurred in Canada. Four sons constituted the children of this family, of which our subject and one brother are the only ones of the family in North Dakota.

Mr. Scott was reared and educated in Wisconsin and began his business career as a farmer and followed the same in Wisconsin until 1880. He came to North Dakota in 1870 and entered a homestead claim to land in Grand Forks county, on which he resided until 1892, when he was elected to his present office. He thoroughly improved the place and it is one of the pleasant farms of the locality. Mr. Scott was elected auditor of Grand Forks county in 1892 and began to serve in that capacity in 1893 and was again elected to that office in 1896, evidencing his efficient work and popularity. He was elected county commissioner in 1881 and was the first commissioner from the fifth district. He was elected as a member of the state legislature in 1884 and served one term.

Our subject was married, in 1875, to Miss Ella Harshman. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Scott, five of whom are now living and bear the following names: Roy, Charles, George, Ruth and Harry. Mrs. Scott died in 1891. HERBERT J. MASTIN, one of the energetic farmers of Stutsman county, is carefully tilling the soil on section 8, in township 139, range 64, and the improvements on his estate evidence his prosperity. Mr. Mastin was born on a farm in Kent county, Michigan, March 12, 1859, and was the fifth in a family of ten children, nine of whom are now living. His father, Joseph Mastin, was partly of Irish descent and his mother, who bore the maiden name of Martha Hart, was of German descent and was born in New York.

Our subject was raised on a farm in his native state and at the age of fourteen years left home and worked at farm labor for about four years, after which he went into the lumber woods of northern Michigan and was later lumber inspector and worked with the firm of Cummer & Son for five years and was regarded by them as one of their most efficient men. He went to North Dakota in the spring of 1882 and entered a pre-emption claim to land which he sold later. He began farming on the land which he now owns and on which he was farm foreman for about six years, after which he purchased an interest in the place and was in partnership in the operation of the same for six years. The partnership was then dissolved and our subject moved to Jamestown and operated a dairy one year and in 1895 purchased the old farm on which he had begun his farming in Dakota. He entered Dakota with about nine dollars and is now the possessor of one hundred and sixty acres of well-improved land and annually cultivates over five hundred acres. He has a complete set of farm buildings and all machinery for the economical conduct of the place and for the past sixteen years has owned and operated a threshing machine and now has a steam rig. He has made a success of his vocation and has provided for his declining years.

Our subject was married, in 1897, to Miss Lillie Anderson, a native of Indiana, who was raised in Michigan. Mrs. Mastin's parents came from Sweden while young and her father, Erick Anderson, was a farmer by occupation. Mrs. Mastin is a member of the Presbyterian church and our subject holds membership in the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

Mrs. Ward was a native of Illinois. Two children have been born to this union, as follows: Verdona, who died aged two years and eight months, and Hiram. Mr. Ward is prominent in secret society circles and is a member of the Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Modern Woodmen of America and is state deputy of the last named, which office he is ably filling and has aided in rapidly increasing the membership of that organization. Politically, he is a Republican and is a man who keeps pace with the times in all matters of a public nature and is strong in his convictions. His success is due alone to his own persistent efforts and he now enjoys prosperity and the confidence of the entire community.

HIRAM A. SPRINGER. This gentleman is well known as an agriculturist of Richland county, North Dakota, and is the fortunate owner of three hundred and twenty acres of land in Danton township. His father was a native of Ohio and was a printer by trade, having started at the work at the age of twelve years. He was foreman of the "North Iowa Times" for twenty-two years, at McGregor, Iowa. He died in March, 1883, and the mother of our subject died February 12, 1900, at McGregor.

Our subject attended the schools of his native place until about seventeen years of age, when he entered the "Times" office and there learned the printer's trade, which he followed five years in that office. He went to Ellendale, Dickey county, North Dakota, in 1883, and at once entered claim to land, which at the end of one year he sold. He then took a position on the "Leader" and worked on that paper and in the "Commercial" office until 1887, when he bought an interest in the "Leader," which was the first paper published in Dickey county. Under the management of Goddard & Wright the paper has prospered and is among the bright exchanges of that region.

JOHN AUGUSTUS JOHNSON, the present efficient and popular mayor of Fargo, North Dakota, was born in Sweden April 24, 1842, and came to the United States in 1854 with his parents, settling in Washington county, Minnesota. He is the son of Lingren and Elizabeth (Lund) Johnson; his mother and two sisters died of cholera soon after their arrival in Minnesota, leaving the father, who lived in Washington county until his death, in July, 1895. After the death of his mother he was thrown upon his own resources to shift for himself in a strange land. He attended school at Stillwater, Minnesota, and also the Epworth Seminary at Epworth, Iowa. In the fall of 1860 he conceived the idea that it would be profitable to raise stock in Texas and went there; the war breaking out prevented him carrying out his plans.

He came north as soon as possible and went to work on the Ohio & Mississippi Railway in Indiana, and soon rose to the position of locomotive engineer, in which capacity he served the United States government during the latter part of the war in Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia. Returning north after the close of hostilities, he went to St. Louis, Missouri, where he was married to Miss Agnes A. Coler, who still survives. After his marriage he returned to Minnesota. Five children have blessed the union: Alice E. (now Mrs. Alice E. Mahnken); J. Chester, an attorney of Fargo; Clarence F., now in California and engaged in newspaper work; Laura A., at home, and Lawrence E., a soldier in the Philippines.

each case receiving every vote in the county. While he was sheriff he devoted his spare time to the study of law in the office of Judge McCluer and has been admitted to practice in all the state and federal courts of Minnesota and North Dakota.

In 1880 he came to Fargo as manager of the corporation of Seymour, Sabin & Company, in which he was largely interested. In 1882 he was elected to the city council in Fargo for two years, but resigned after serving one year. In 1883 he was elected a member of the board of education of the city of Fargo and in 1885 was elected mayor of Fargo, defeating Charles R. Reddick. In 1896 he was again elected mayor of Fargo, defeating Colonel W. F. Ball, and was again re-elected in 1898, defeating Mr. O. G. Barnes by the largest majority ever given a mayoralty candidate in Fargo. He is also first vice-president of the League of American Municipalities, an international organization consisting of the leading cities of the United States and Canada.

Mr. Johnson has traveled extensively in Central and South America, the West Indies and Europe. In 1897 he was tendered the position of consul to Guttenburg, Sweden, and declined, which was very much of a surprise to many of his friends, there being over fifty applicants for the position, while Mr. Johnson had not filed any papers nor made an application for it. Some of the Twin City papers cartooned him as the "Fargo freak," it being an unheard of thing for a North Dakotian to refuse a federal appointment, more especially one of so much importance and which carried so great honors as the one he refused.

Mr. Johnson is a member of various fraternal organizations, such as the Masons, Odd Fellows, United Commercial Travelers of America and the Zodiac, and has held important official positions in them all. In Masonry he is a Knight Templar and a member of the Mystic Shrine and was an officer of the Grand Masonic Lodge of Minnesota for a number of years. He was also deputy grand master of the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows for Minnesota one term and has represented his council in the Grand Council of Commercial Travelers of America. For many years Mr. Langworthy was engaged in farming, and is now the owner of a fine estate, and also conducts a lucrative business in lumber and fuel in Courtenay.

Our subject was born in Bay City, Michigan, in 1868. His father, D. A. Langworthy, was of English descent, and the family has been in America for several generations. He was a dry goods merchant in Bay City, Michigan, and moved to Dakota in 1884, where he took land in Stutsman county, five miles north of Courtenay. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Isabella Cook, was born and raised in New York, and was a daughter of George Cook, who was of English descent, and was a merchant.

Our subject was the younger of two children, and attended the city schools of his native place, and in 1884 went with his parents to North Dakota. They lived in a claim shanty for a few months, and our subject assisted his father on the farm until 1880, when he entered claim to government land and also acquired land by purchase and engaged in farming. He fully improved the farm, and added to his possessions from time to time, and is now the owner of eight hundred acres of land, five hundred acres of which he operates. He began buying grain for the Osburn McMillan Elevator Company in the fall of 1896, and in December of that year established a lumber yard, which he has enlarged, and now carries a complete stock in that line, and also fuel.

Our subject was married, in 1899, to Miss Maud Bronson, who was born and raised in Vermont. Mrs. Langworthy's parents went to North Dakota about 1885, and her father, C. R. Bronson, is in the employ of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Mrs. Langworthy is a lady of rare accomplishments, and taught several years in the public schools of North Dakota. Mr. Langworthy is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Modern Woodmen of America. Politically he is a Republican, and is a man who is strong in his convictions for right.

CHARLES J. O. JACOBSON, an intelligent and enterprising general merchant of Preston, Ransom county, enjoys prosperity, mainly through the exercise of good management and honest dealings. He is the present postmaster of Preston, and is efficient in the service.

Our subject was born in Lillhammer, Norway, February 5, 1856, and was the oldest son and second in order of birth in a family of eight children born to Carl J. and Anna (Olson) Jacobson. His father was a goldsmith by trade and passed his days in his native land. Our subject was educated in the high schools of Norway, and learned both German and English in connection with his own language. He was employed in clerking in his native country, and in 1880 came to America on a visit, intending to return after a short stay. He went to Minnesota and there accepted a position in a store at Alexandria, and about 1887 went to Valley City, where he was employed in a store. He formed a partnership with Mr. Lovelace in 1891, at Fort Ransom, and in 1894 disposed of his share of the business, and located his present store. He carries a complete stock of general merchandise, which, when invoiced last winter, amounted to $4,000. He enjoys his share of the patronage, and has extended his possessions by earnest labors.

Our subject was married, in 1883, to Miss Eva Olsen, a native of Rushford, Fillmore county, Minnesota, who was born January 1, 1864. Mr. and Mrs. Jacobson are the parents of five children, as follows: Annie, Mary, Edwin, Rush, and Chester. Mr. Jacobson has served as school treasurer, and taken an active part in educational matters, continually urging more competent instruction and longer terms of school. He is progressive, and public-spirited, and is deservedly held in the highest esteem by his fellows. Politically he is a Republican.

FRANK W. SCHLABERG, county commissioner of Grand Forks county, and the pioneer druggist of the city of Grand Forks, was born in Waverly, Iowa, March 14, 1862. His parents, Charles F. and Anna (Turner) Schlberg, were natives of Glasgow, Scotland, and Northumberland county, England, respectively. They came to the United States in 1847, and located in Iowa in the early 'fifties. The father is still a resident of Iowa, the mother having died some years ago.

Frank W. Schlberg was reared and educated in Waverly, Iowa, attending the public schools and devoting his spare time to study at home. In 1880, when he was eighteen years of age, he came to Dakota, and found employment in the drug store of D. M. Holmes of Grand Forks. He continued as an employe in this store four years, and then became a partner in the business. In 1896 he succeeded to the ownership of the business, which he still conducts. He is a wide-awake, enterprising business man, and his store is one of the leading business houses of the city.

Mr. Schlberg has never been a seeker of political favors, but has always taken an active and intelligent interest in public affairs, and has done his duty as a citizen, in the interest of good government. Since his election to office of county commissioner he has performed the important duties devolving upon him with fidelity to the interests of the people of the county, and has proved a capable and efficient official.

In 1897 Mr. Schlberg was married to Miss Amanda C. Liedman, a native of St. Paul, Minnesota. Mr. and Mrs. Schlberg have one son, Warren. Mr. Schlberg is very popular in social circles, and is a member of the various organizations of the city, including the Masons, the Knights of Pythias, of which he is past chancellor, the Elks and the A. O. U. W. In politics he is a Democrat.

EDWARD C. GEAREY, a worthy representative of the Fargo bar and the present efficient police judge of that city, was born in Hudson, Columbia county, New York, June 11, 1841; and is a son of Hamilton B. and Harriet E. (Macy) Gearey, also natives of New York. In early life the father was a seaman, but later engaged in business as a carpenter and builder. In 1849 he went to California and on his return east remained in New York until 1870, when he removed to Minnesota, where his death occurred in 1877. In his family were six children, four sons and two daughters, of whom one died in infancy.

In the common schools of his native state, Edward C. Gearey obtained a good practical education. He manifested his patriotism and love of country during the Civil war by enlisting August 11, 1862, as a private in Company E, One Hundred and Fortyninth New York Volunteer Infantry, which was assigned to the Army of the Potomac. He participated in the battles of Winchester, Leesburg, Dumfries, and Chancellorsville, and after the last named engagement was taken ill. In 1863 he was transferred to the Thirty-second United States Colored Troops with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and was in service with that regiment until 1865. He was wounded at Honeyhill, South Carolina, on which account he was honorably discharged.

Returning to his home in New York, Mr. Gearey remained there until November, 1865, when he removed to Wabasha county, Minnesota. During his residence there he engaged in farming and filled a number of important official positions, being a member of the lower house of the state legislature for three terms. In 1883 he came to Fargo as receiver in the United States land office, and held that position for four years, during which time he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1885. Before retiring from the land office he had succeeded in building up a good practice, and is today one of the most successful as well as able attorneys of the place. Here he has also been honored with public office and has served as police judge since 1897.

On the 25th of March, 1864, was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Gearey and Miss E. Amelia Wells, also a native of New York, and to them have been born five children who are still living, namely: Hamilton W., cashier of the Merchants' State Bank of Fargo; Lucia A., wife of E. C. Griffith; Edward C., Jr., captain of Company B, First North Dakota Infantry, now with the brave boys at Manila; Frances M., wife of W. J. Heapes and John W., a private in the company of which his brother is captain.

The Republican party has always found in Mr. Gearey a staunch supporter of its principles, and he was the first chairman of the state central committee in North Dakota. He is now chairman of the Cass county committee and has been honored with many important political positions. He is past department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic in this state, is president of the soldiers' home board, and is a member of the Minnesota Commandery of the Loyal Legion. He is also a Knight Templar Mason and a Shriner, and is quite prominent in social, political and professional circles. As a citizen he meets every requirement and manifests a commendable interest in everything that is calculated to promote the welfare of his adopted city or state.

HOMER A. NORTHROP, a prosperous and progressive farmer of Willow Lake township, in Steele county, is one of the pioneer settlers of that locality. His pleasant home is on section 20, and the surroundings meet the approval of the eye, in striking contrast to the monotony of the prairie lands around.

Our subject was born in Fairfield county, Connecticut, May 20, 1840, and was the eldest in a family of seven children, born to Burr B. and Maria (Benedict) Northrop. The Northrop family is of English descent, and their settlement in America dates to Colonial times. Our subject was taken to the state of New York by his parents when he was but an infant, and the family made their home in Onondaga county, where our subject remained on the farm until after attaining his manhood. He enlisted in Company G, One Hundred and Forty-ninth New York Volunteer Infantry, September 16, 1862. The first engagement was the battle of Chickamauga, then he served on detailed duty at Gettysburg, after which followed Wauhatchie, Lookout Mountain, Ringgold, Resaca, Peach Tree Creek, and the capture of Atlanta. Thence he went southward to the sea, through the Carolinas, and joined in the Grand Review at Washington. He was mustered out at Syracuse, New York, in June, 1865, after a long and faithful service. After returning from the war our subject obtained land and engaged in farming near his old home, and in the fall of 1881 he disposed of his interests in the East and sought his fortunes in the new West. He went to Tower City, Dakota, in March, 1882, and in company with three other land seekers was shown over Griggs county. Mr. Northrop located in the part of Griggs county which later became known as Steele county. The country was then wild and the prairie scenery monotonous, and our subject chose land on the north bank of a beautiful little sheet of water known as Willow lake. It then contained about ten feet of water, but has since become dry, but the surroundings are pleasant and the farm is admirably adapted to stock raising, affording fine grange and shelter. Our subject moved his family to the new home in the fall of 1883, and they were installed in a 12x24-foot shanty. Crops as a whole were light until 1891, since which time they have yielded well, and prosperity has attended the work, and our subject is now the fortunate possessor of one and a half sections of land.

Mr. Northrop was married in 1886, to Miss Lydia M. Newton, a native of New York. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Northrop, as follows: Charles N., now farming in Willow Lake township; William H., a graduate of Valley City Normal, a student of McAllister College, and a teacher in Steele county, and also associated with his father in farming; Edwin M., farming in Willow Lake township; Kida A., a teacher in the schools of Hope, North Dakota, and Mary E., now Mrs. George Smith, of Barnes county, North Dakota. Mr. Northrop takes an active part in public affairs, and is the present township treasurer, and has also served as chairman of the township board of supervisors. He is a member of the Presbyterian church. Politically he is a Republican, but does not mix in party affairs to any extent.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON, a prosperous and intelligent farmer of township 147, range 66, in Foster county, was one of the earliest settlers of that locality and has witnessed the growth of that region and aided in its development. In connection with this sketch will be found a portrait of Mr. Robertson.

Our subject was born on a farm in Scotland in 1858. His father, William Robertson, was a farmer and came to America and was an old settler in Dakota. Our subject was the fourth in a family of ten children and was raised in Scotland and attended the country schools until nineteen years of age, and remained at home two years thereafter and in 1879 emigrated to Canada, landing at Quebec. He worked in Pilkington county, Ontario, about five years and had charge of a large herd of fine bred cattle and horses, and then went to Youngstown,

W. Robertson

Ohio, where he hired out at farm labor and here had charge of a valuable herd of blooded cattle and horses, including one cow valued at ten thousand dollars and a horse valued at forty thousand dollars. He came to North Dakota in 1883 and located in Jamestown and rented land adjoining the town and farmed thereon one year, and in 1884 came to Foster county and entered claim to government land in section 34, township 147, range 66. He built a house, 30x16 feet, and his brother, Joseph, and sister, Maggie R., lived with him. He built a sod barn and in 1884 raised his first crop in Foster county on rented land. His house and contents burned the following spring and he lost one thousand dollars' worth of property and had nothing left. He cultivated one thousand acres of land in 1894 and hail destroyed the entire crop. He now has a farm of three hundred and twenty acres and operates eight hundred acres annually and in 1900 seeded six hundred acres. His buildings are of the most approved style and are commodious and substantial, and his farm is among the best in the township in the way of improvements. He engages in stock and grain raising and has nineteen head of horses and ten head of cattle, all necessary farm machinery and a well equipped farm in every particular. He followed threshing five years from 1887, and superintended the running of the machine personally. He was among the earliest settlers of township 147, range 66, and Carrington was a small village when he located in this county. He has traveled extensively and as an agricultural district North Dakota, in his judgment, is the best he has visited, and his success is due to his efforts here.

TYLER J. WALKER, general merchant and proprietor of the Fort Ransom Roller Mills, resides in one of the most pleasant spots in Fort Ransom. He is a pioneer of that region, and his efforts have been rewarded by the acquisition of a fine property and an extensive business. His home is one of social comfort and every appointment bespeaks the refinement and culture of its occupants.

Mr. Walker was born in Rushford, Fillmore county, Minnesota, May 5, 1859, and was the fourth in a family of eight children born to Hiram and Celestia (Nims) Walker. His father was a miller and manufacturer and in 1877 went to Valley City, Dakota, and erected the first mill of that place. Our subject joined him in 1879, and the following year went to Fort Ransom, and filed claim to land, and began farming, and also engaged without aid in the construction of a dam, and the erection of a saw mill, and then from the native timber began the erection of a flouring mill, the capacity of which is now forty barrels. He lived alone two years, camping in a beautiful spot in the bend of the Shyenne river, directly across from his mill. This place is now a favorite summer camping ground, and the objective point of picnic parties for many miles around. Boating, fishing and bathing are the chief enjoyments, and our subject and wife extend their hospitality to all, and the camping ground, known as "The Park," is open to all. Our subject established in the general merchandise business in 1895, and now carries a complete stock and enjoys prosperity.

In connection with this review it were well to mention the history of the place. Fort Ransom, the site of the old fort, the breastworks of which alone remain, was known by the Indians as Matoti, meaning Bear's Den Hillock. The name properly was applied to the highest point of land near the old fort. Near the fort is a spring of purest water, near by which is a flat rock, inscribed in characters which have never been translated, and are probably the work of Indians.

Mr. Walker was married, in 1885, to Miss Mary Hoiland, who is also a native of Rushford, Fillmore county, Minnesota, and was born November 15, 1864, and is a daughter of Aadne and Johanna Hoiland. Mrs. Walker is a lady of refined tastes, and housewifely instinct, and the home is a model in every particular. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Walker, named as follows: Lettie and Bessie. Mr. Walker is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Modern Woodmen of America, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Independent Order of Foresters. He is now serving his third term as county commissioner, and takes an active interest in the advancement of his community. Politically he is a Populist.

THEO F. KERR, M. D. This gentleman is the pioneer physician and surgeon of Griggs county and has built an extensive practice throughout that region, and is widely known as an exemplary citizen and skillful practitioner. He has resided in Cooperstown since the early days of its history and has been liberal in rendering aid to all public projects. He is intelligent and progressive and therefore popular as a physician and social friend of his fellows. He has always labored for educational advancement and is one of the promoters of the school systems of that region.

Our subject was born near Owosco Lake, in Cayuga county, New York, May 29, 1846, and was the fifth in a family of eleven children, four sons and seven daughters, born to Alexander and Harriet (Hammond) Kerr. His father was a native of New Jersey and was married in Cayuga county, New York. A brother of our subject, John F., was a soldier in the Civil war, enlisting during 1864, and he was killed at Kinston, North Carolina, March 8, 1865.

Our subject remained in his native county until ten years of age, when he removed with his parents to a farm near Ann Arbor, Michigan. He attended the city schools and graduated from the high school, and then entered the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he took a degree in literature and art. He then went to California and accepted the chair of teacher in Latin and mathematics in the Military Academy at Oakland, which position he filled from 1869 to 1871, and during the next year he was principal of one of the public schools of Buffalo, New York. Here he began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. Thomas Lothrop, a prominent physician of that city, and then returned to Ann Arbor and took a course of lectures, and afterward pursued his studies in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York City and later in the Columbia University, graduating in the medical class of 1874. He then began the practice of his profession in Detroit, Michigan, and continued there until he went to North Dakota in the early '80s. He located in Cooperstown before the railroad was built through that locality and experienced many hardships in the practice of his profession through that country. On one occasion he traveled about twenty-five miles to visit a sick man and upon his arrival found him in a dying condition in a sod hut, where Mr. Kerr was stornbound three days. The patient died, and a young man, who was his partner, and the Doctor were forced to stay with the corpse and subsist on meager rations three days before the storm broke sufficiently for the Doctor to return, and when he did he made the journey through a foot of snow the entire distance. Such experiences are of the past and Mr. Kerr now enjoys an extensive and remunerative patronage.

Our subject was married, in Ann Arbor, Michigan, in 1874, to Miss Eliza Hill, a native of Wash-tenaw county, that state, and a daughter of Fitch and Martha Hill. Mrs. Kerr's father was a farmer and contractor and builder. Two children, both of whom are deceased, were born to Mr. and Mrs. Kerr, named Kenneth and Theo. Mr. Kerr was the first superintendent of schools of Griggs county and held the office until 1894, and he is one of the foremost men of the county from an educational as well as professional view. He has always affiliated with the Republican party in political faith.

CHARLES J. MAHNKEN. Among the able and successful lawyers of Fargo, North Dakota, none stand higher in public esteem than the gentleman whose name introduces this sketch. He was born in Baltimore, Maryland, November 8, 1860, a son of Charles H. and Mary (Miller) Mahnken, natives of Germany, who came to the United States when children and spent most of their lives in Maryland. The father is now deceased, but the mother is still living.

Our subject was reared and educated in New York City, where he attended the public schools. At the age of fourteen he entered a law office as errand boy and clerk, and later spent a year or two at sea as a sailor, during which time he visited many European ports. When eighteen years of age he began the study of law and took a course in the New York City University. He was admitted to practice at the metropolis in 1881 and had an office there for two years. In 1882 he again visited Europe on legal business, spending six months abroad.

In July, 1883, Mr. Mahnken took up his residence in Fargo, North Dakota, and formed a law partnership with H. D. Hobson, which connection existed until 1885, when Mr. Hobson retired. From 1891 until 1893 our subject was engaged in practice with J. E. Greene, but since then has been alone. He is now at the head of a large and prosperous business and ranks high among his brethren of the legal fraternity. He was elected city attorney in 1896 and again in 1898, and in that capacity served his fellow citizens ably and well. Politically he is a staunch Republican, but has never taken a very active part in political affairs, and socially is a prominent Mason, a member of the Mystic Shrine.

On the 26th of June, 1886, Mr. Mahnken led to the marriage altar Miss Alice E. Johnson, daughter of Mayor Johnson, of Fargo, and they have a family of three children, namely: Alice, Edith and Charles.

WILLIAM WANSBROUGH, who is now successfully engaged in the confectionery business at Valley City, North Dakota, is a native of New York, his birth occurring there May 25, 1839. His father, William Wansbrough, Sr., a hatter by trade, was born near the city of London, England, and emigrated to the United States in 1812. When twelve years old our subject moved with his parents to Licking county, Ohio, where he lived on a farm for three years. He then entered a blacksmith shop at Granville, Ohio, as an apprentice, and was there employed for three years, after which he worked for one year in the village of Jersey, the same county. The following year he worked at his trade in Alexandria, Ohio, and then returned to Jersey, purchasing the shop where he had formerly worked as an employe.

While at that place Mr. Wansbrough was united in marriage with Miss Susie Handley, of Jersey township, and to them were born five daughters. Four of this number have on different occasions successfully engaged in school teaching. In 1874 Mr. Wansbrough removed to Pana, Christian county, Illinois, where he conducted a blacksmith and machine shop for two years. He next accepted a position with the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad in their shops at that place, and on leaving there he went to Mattoon, Illinois, where, as a blacksmith, he entered the shops of the Peoria, Decatur & Evansville Railroad, and he remained for two years. He then lived for one year on a farm in Coles county, near Mattoon, and in 1883 came to North Dakota, settling first at Jamestown, where he worked at the carpenter's trade for some time, having also become familiar with that occupation in Licking county, Ohio, in early life. In 1884 he went to La Moure county, where he took up land and engaged in farming for ten years. During the following year he worked at the carpenter's trade in Fargo, then spent four years as a clerk in a lumber yard at Galesburg, and in March, 1899, came to Valley City, where he is now engaged in the confectionery business. During the Civil war he entered the service of his country, enlisting in Company D, One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and is now a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is widely known and highly respected and has made many friends in the various communities where he has made his home.

ALEXANDER SPRINGER, a prominent and influential citizen of Danton township, Richland county, has been a resident of that locality for over fifteen years. He is an extensive land owner and aside from improving his farms has followed the occupation of a carpenter more or less, and many of the public buildings of that region are his handiwork. In Richland county alone he has erected the Methodist and Episcopal churches, many residences and fifteen school houses and is well known as a systematic and thorough workman.

Our subject was born in Alexandria, Jefferson county, New York, November 4, 1849. At the age of twenty years he went to Whiteside county, Illinois, where he resided until the spring of 1882. He then went to Dakota and located on section 27, in Danton township, residing there until 1892, when he removed to section 19 of the same township, residing there at the present time. He has erected a set of good buildings on his farm and is the owner of five hundred and sixty acres of land, most of which is in Danton township.

Our subject was married, in Evans Mills, Jefferson county, New York, June 26, 1869, to Miss Emma A. Russell, who was born in Jefferson county, New York, July 21, 1847. Mrs. Springer died in Danton township May 23, 1897. Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Springer, as follows: Ernest O.; Rosa L., now Mrs. Herbert Helmer; Anna M., now Mrs. George Strong; and George R. Mr. Springer takes an active part in church affairs and is an earnest worker. He has been called upon to fill numerous local offices and has served as school clerk for ten successive years, chairman of the board of supervisors three terms, justice of the peace three terms, constable two terms and school director. He was appointed postmaster of Moselle by President McKinley in July, 1896, which office he still holds.

THOMAS MCCOY, residing on section 24, in Kelso township, is one of the first settlers of Traill county and has become one of the most prominent and influential citizens. He conducts an extensive farm, which he has acquired by dint of energetic efforts, and his high standing as a farmer and his pleasant surroundings are the result of his well spent career.

Our subject was born in Lanark county, Upper Canada, November 20, 1847, and was the eighth in a family of eleven children born to Neil and Rose (McNaughton) McCoy. His parents were born in Ireland and his father, who is now over ninety years of age, resides on the old homestead in Canada.

Mr. McCoy was reared to farming and as a woodsman and was thus occupied in Canada until 1873, when he went to Ottertal county, Minnesota, and in the spring of 1877; after losing his crops in Minnesota, he went to North Dakota and accepted a position as foreman of Division No. 2 on the Grandin farm, and was thus employed eight years. He filed on land in 1877, on which his wife lived, and there Mrs. McCoy contributed her share to pioneering. In 1885 Mr. McCoy began farming about four hundred acres of land for himself and he is now the owner of one thousand acres. His farm is well drained by the Elm river, which passes through it, and the entire estate bears evidence of the best of management and careful tillage. Mr. McCoy has been remarkably successful in his farming deals, on one occasion, in 1891, purchasing a half-section of land and the same fall gathering sufficient crop from the tract to pay for the land and have a good balance. This land has since doubled in value and is one of the best yielding tracts of the entire farm.

Our subject was married, in 1875, to Miss Catherine Tierney. Nine children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McCoy, as follows: William, now at home; Minnie; Vincent, a student of Morehead Normal School; Annie, a student of the academy at Fargo; Anastacia, a student of the academy at Grand Forks; Ambrose; Celia; Tessie and Alfred. Mr. McCoy has served as chairman of the township board and in various local offices, and was elected county commissioner in 1889, serving two terms. Mr. McCoy is one of the few men of Democratic faith who has been elected to county offices and he is popular with all, regardless of party interests. He is a member of the Catholic church and is an exemplary citizen and one who enjoys well-merited success.

FRANK LONG. The early settlement of North Dakota called to that state many men of energetic spirit and good character. They entered into all trades and vocations, and perhaps one of the most important was the farming interests which have been so materially enhanced by this class of citizens. Among those who now enjoy a comfortable home and the esteem of their fellow men stands the gentleman above named. He located first in Traill county, North Dakota, but for the past seventeen years has been a resident of Cass county and is well known as an old settler and exemplary citizen of Ayr township.

Our subject was born in Dodge county, Wisconsin, May 20, 1857. His parents, John and Francis (Schwahr) Long, were born in Germany and came to America about 1837 and settled in New York, and in 1840 moved to Dodge county, Wisconsin, where the mother still lives and the father died there. They had two sons and two daughters who grew to maturity, and our subject is the only one in North Dakota.

Mr. Long spent his boyhood and early youth in Dodge county, Wisconsin, and in 1880 went to North Dakota and entered a claim to land in Traill county, which he sold in 1883 and then settled in Cass county, where he has since resided and has met with remarkable success as an agriculturist.

Our subject was married, in 1886, to Sarah E. Preston, a native of Oakfield, Wisconsin. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Long, as follows: Francis, Thomas A. and Inez E., all of whom are living. Mr. Long was one of the organizers of Ayr township and is a man of active public spirit. Politically he is a Republican and stands firmly for the principles of his party. He holds membership in the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

DONALD NIVEN, one of the leading business men and general farmers of Eddy county, North Dakota, is a resident of New Rockford. He is an old settler of North Dakota and has prospered and is widely and favorably known. He was born near Glasgow, Scotland, in 1857.

The father of our subject, Donald Niven, was a merchant in Scotland and died in his native land. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Margaret McPhee, came to America after the death of the father and settled in Canada with her family in 1864. Our subject was early thrown upon his own resources, and at the age of ten years began working out and had very limited opportunities for obtaining an education. He came to the United States from Ontario at the age of twenty-two years and located at Duluth, Minnesota. He worked in a butcher shop there two years and learned the business and in 1882 went to Jamestown, North Dakota. He took charge of the market of Archie McKechnie, and was then sheriff of Stutsman county, and he was thus employed one year, when he was made deputy sheriff and served two years in that capacity, and about 1885, in company with Greager Schmidt, he moved to Minnewatkon, North Dakota, and they started the first meat market in the town. Our subject and partner erected one of the first buildings of the town, and the lumber they hauled over ice twenty-five miles from Devil's Lake. After getting the business established there our subject drove a stage from Devil's Lake to Bottineau, nearly ninety miles, and made daily trips. He carried the United States mail one year and was once caught in a blizzard. The business in Minnewatkon prospered and in 1887 they established a branch market at New Rockford, the first established market in the town. The partnership was dissolved in 1888 and our subject took the New Rockford market, since which time he has conducted the business in that town and has met with success while others have attempted and failed. He took land as a homestead near New Rockford in 1892 and has since followed farming extensively. He is now the owner of nine hundred and sixty acres of land and follows general farming and the buying and selling of cattle.

Mr. Niven is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Brotherhood of American Yeomen. He takes an active part in social affairs and in political sentiment is a Republican.

ASLE ENGBRETSON, residing in section 18, in Eldorado township, operates a farm of seven hundred and twenty acres and is one of the substantial and highly esteemed early settlers of that region. He follows diversified farming and is well versed in his calling and has met with unbounded success. His portrait is presented on another page.

Our subject was born in Nore, Prestegjeld Nummedal, Norway, June 25, 1857, and was the youngest of a family of nine children, only three of whom are now living. His parents, Ingebert and Ligeri Asleson, became early settlers of Dakota, and passed away at the home of our subject, the father February 20, 1889, and the mother May 14, 1896.

When about sixteen years of age our subject crossed the ocean with his parents and sister to join his brother who had previously settled in this country, and they made their home in Clayton county, Iowa. Our subject worked there a few months at farm labor and then went to Palo Alto county, Iowa, and there remained until the spring of 1879 when he borrowed some money and with his parents went to Dakota, arriving at Caledonia with but two and a half dollars. Father and son both secured land, our subject taking his as a pre-emption, and after about two years turned it into a homestead. He broke two and a half acres of land and built a sod stable and in January, 1881, fearing others would take the claim, he erected a board shanty on top of four feet of snow. The snow was so deep that he could not haul the lumber to the site of his building and he was obliged to dump the load and then carry it piece by piece to his building through the snow. He now has a good farm with excellent improvements, including an artesian well, which was completed after seven years in attempting to secure water and is sunk to a depth of two hundred and sixty-two feet. He engages in general farming and has a property well adapted to that line of agriculture. He has a comfortable and convenient residence, erected in 1892.

Our subject was married, in 1888, to Miss Annie Bergstrum, a native of Manitowoc, Wisconsin. Mrs. Engebretson spent most of her career in Iowa and when seventeen years of age began teaching and for seven years was identified with educational work in Palo Alto county. Mr. and Mrs. Engebretson are the parents of three children, named as follows: Signora Alvina, Irvin LeGrande and Alice Steplena. The family are members of the Lutheran church and are held in high esteem throughout the community in which they make their home. Our subject has served many years on the township board and is active in public affairs of local importance. He is a Republican in political sentiment and has attended numerous state conventions.

WILLIAM F. REDMON, of Fargo, is now serving his third term as register of deeds of Cass county, North Dakota, and the duties of the office he has most efficiently and satisfactorily performed. He was born in Davenport, Iowa, April 17, 1854. His parents, Elijah N. and Sarah A. (Knapp) Redmon, were natives of Illinois and Pennsylvania, respectively, and were among the early settlers of Iowa, locating there in the early '50s. After some years' residence in that state they removed to Prescott, Wisconsin, where both died. The father was a grain dealer.

Mr. Redmon, of this review, passed his boyhood and youth in Wisconsin and completed his education in the State University at Madison, graduating from the law department of that institution in 1876. He never engaged in the practice of his profession, however, but was for some time interested in the grain business with his father at Prescott, Wisconsin. He came to North Dakota in 1881 and took up a claim in Cass county, which he improved and afterward sold. "During his entire residence in this state he has followed farming in company with his brother and has been eminently successful.

In 1880 was celebrated the marriage of Mr. Redmon and Miss Cora E. Gates, a native of Wisconsin, by whom he has two children, namely: John N. and Ruby A. Socially he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Modern Woodmen of America, and politically is identified with the Republican party. He has creditably filled a number of minor offices and in 1894 was elected register of deeds for Cass county, to which position he was re-elected in 1896 and again in 1898, being the present incumbent. He has always been found true and faithful to every trust reposed in him, whether public or private and is held in high regard by all who know him.

EDGAR A. PRAY, M. D. One of the most exacting of all the higher lines of occupation to which a man may lend his energies is that of the physician. A most scrupulous preliminary training is demanded, a nicety of judgment but little understood by the laity. Through his own efforts our subject is well fitted for the profession which he has chosen as a life work, and his skill and ability have won him a lucrative practice in Valley City and throughout the surrounding country.

Dr. Pray was born in the city of Afton, Minnesota, February 26, 1868, and is a son of Russell N. and Lydia P. (Van Slyke) Pray, both natives of New York state, the former in 1829, the latter in 1842. They now make their home in Barnes county, North Dakota. Throughout life the father has followed the occupation of contractor and builder and for the past fifteen years has engaged in farming.

The Doctor attended school in his native town until ten years of age and then came with his parents to Fargo, North Dakota, where he continued his studies in the high school for a time. Subsequently he entered Carleton College at Northfield, Minnesota, where he was a student for two years, and in the fall of 1891 matriculated at the University of Pennsylvania, where he took a full course in medicine and surgery, graduating in the class of 1894. His education was mainly secured through his own efforts and for the success that he has achieved in life he deserves great credit. Immediately after leaving the university Dr. Pray opened an office at Valley City and it is now said of him that he enjoys the largest practice of any physician in Barnes county. He is one of the most popular citizens of the place and is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Foresters, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Fraternal Union of America.

Dr. Pray was united in marriage with Miss Frances A. Peake, who was born in San Jose, California, in 1870, a daughter of Ebenezer S. and Mary A. Peake. At present her father is chaplain of St. Mary's School for Girls at Faribault, Minnesota. He was one of the first missionaries of the Episcopal church in the great northwest territory. The Doctor and his wife have two children, boys, Ralph and Russell.

EDWIN D. WASHBURN. A striking example of what can be accomplished by persistent efforts and honest industry is afforded in the life of this gentleman. He is one of the earliest pioneers of Steele county and makes his home on section 24, in Hope township, and is one of the few farmers of that region who have stayed on their pioneer farms and made a success of their vocation. He is now the fortunate owner of one of the well developed farms of that locality, and despite the discouragements incident to frontier life has gathered about him comforts to be enjoyed in his declining years.

Our subject was born in Oneida county, New York, July 11, 1859, and he and his elder sister were the only children born to Edwin R. and Etheline (Ward) Washburn. His parents are now living in Marshall, Michigan, where the family settled when our subject was a boy. He was reared to farm work and in March, 1881, went to North Dakota in search of a home in the wonderful farming lands of the Red river valley. He worked a season in Cass county and soon filed claim to land in Steele county, then a part of Griggs county. For the first few years he made occasional visits to his property and arranged for some improvements and during the summers of 1882 and 1883 experienced the life of a bachelor in a new country. During the early days hunting was the chief amusement, ducks and geese, antelope and an occasional elk varying the sport. It was our subject's privilege to see the last stray buffalo known in that part of the state and to dine at Tower City on a steak cut from this last of the herd of North Dakota. Mr. Washburn now has a well improved property and every necessary convenience is supplied on his farm.

Our subject was married, in 1884, to Miss Letitia E. Howard, a native of Michigan. Mrs. Washburn is a lady of rare attainments and much of her life has been devoted to educational work. She was a teacher for ten years and is one of the oldest teachers of Steele county. The first school in Hope township outside of the city of Hope, in 1888, was taught by Mrs. Washburn, in a 12x14-foot shanty, and nine scholars completed the roll. A photograph of the building and pupils is preserved in the home of Mr. Washburn as a relic of pioneer times. One son has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Washburn, upon whom they have bestowed the name of Howard E. Mr. Washburn is a member of the Masonic fraternity and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Politically he is a Democrat and is an earnest worker for the principles of his party. He is a man who keeps abreast of the times in all public matters of importance and is highly esteemed throughout his township and county as a public-spirited and wide-awake citizen.

CHARLES A. NULPH, a prosperous farmer of Danton township, Richland county, is known throughout the locality as an energetic and wide-awake citizen. He and his father, Daniel Nulph, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere, were the first settlers of Danton township, and it was for his father that our subject named the township Danton. He has been a resident of section 34 since taking up his residence in North Dakota, and has gained extensive land interests.

Charles A. Nulph was born in Sac county, Wisconsin, November 6, 1847, and went to Dakota with his father in May, 1879. He entered a homestead claim to land on section 34, which is his present home farm. He is the owner of six hundred and forty acres of land in Danton and Liberty townships and his farm is one of the well-improved estates of the locality.

Our subject was married, in Blue Earth county, Minnesota, May 14, 1876, to Miss Orissa M. Mack, a native of Vermont. Six children have been born to M. and Mrs. Nulph. Those living are Harry A. and Beatrice L. Katie E. died at the age of two years; Charles L. died at the age of seven months; Jessie E. died in infancy; Carrie L. died at the age of two years. Mr. Nulph takes an active part in all local affairs of interest and is an ardent worker for the advancement of his community. He has held various offices of trust and has been chairman of the board of supervisors for ten years and school director three years. He is well versed on matters under general discussion and is one of the substantial men of Danton township.

DANIEL NULPH, for whom the township of Danton, Richland county, was named, is a prosperous farmer of section 34. He and his son, Charles A., whose life history is given elsewhere, were the first settlers of Danton township and have both been continuous residents since.

Daniel Nulph was born in Jefferson county, Pennsylvania, March 20, 1823. He was reared in Jefferson and Venango counties, Pennsylvania, and at fifteen years of age went to Dubuque county, Iowa, where he engaged in farming about five years. He then went to Adams county, Wisconsin, working at farming and on the Wisconsin and Mississippi rivers fifteen years at rafting. He then went to Blue Earth county, Minnesota, where he resided several years, and in 1879 went to Dakota. He entered claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 34, in Danton township, where he has since resided. He is now the owner of four hundred and eighty acres of land and his farm bears every evidence of careful management and systematic work.

Our subject was married, in Dubuque county, Iowa, to Barbara Ann Hyatt, a native of Ohio. Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Nulph, as follows: Mary A., Charles A., Walter S., Claretta, John, George, Grant and Ezra. Mr. Nulph has witnessed the development of that region and has aided in its transformation from a wild country to a thriving agricultural district. He is ever interested in the welfare of his community and lends his influence for every enterprise of a public nature.

THEODORE P. SLATTUM, who enjoys the distinction of being the most extensive farmer and land owner in the Sheyenne valley, Preston township, Ransom county, has accumulated his fortune by honest industry and skillful management. His home is in section 30, township 136, range 57, and is one of comfort, and although a quaint log house serves as his dwelling it shelters hospitality and brotherly kindness. Mr. Slattum owns about one thousand acres of land and it is a praiseworthy fact that he has never placed a mortgage on any of his possessions, having steadily gone forward to fortune and prosperity.

Our subject was born in Christiania, Norway, August 18, 1836, and was the eldest son in a family of five children. He spent eleven years of his life in the army, attaining the rank of sergeant, and also learned the trade of stave-maker. He came to America in 1870 and settled in Fillmore county, Minnesota, and in 1879 pushed his way westward to Dakota with an ox-team and forty dollars in money. He was one of the first settlers of the valley and for the past twenty years has not been outside the state. He crops annually about five hundred acres of land.

Our subject was married, in 1859, to Miss Jougine Slattum. Nine children have blessed this union, as follows: Carl, now married and living near his parents; Bertie Marie, deceased; Jens, farming near home; Alexandria, now married; Frand; John, married and living in Barnes county; Hans, leader of the Preston brass band; Ole F., deceased; and Olaf. The family have much musical talent and their home is cheered by strains of music and every comfort afforded the occupants, while the stranger within their home is accorded a most hearty welcome.

JAMES LYNCH. The farming interests of Liberty township, Richland county, have a worthy representative in the person of the gentleman above named, who operates a farm in section 6. He has improved his estate and made it one on which a remunerative business may be done by one who devotes himself intelligently to his work. In the way of buildings such arrangements have been made as tend to the economical conduct of the farm and for the comfort of the family a substantial dwelling has been constructed.

Our subject was born in Green Lake county, Wisconsin, February 21, 1850. He was reared in his native county and made his home there until he went to North Dakota in 1879. He then entered a homestead claim in section 4, and a tree claim in section 6 and located on the former. In 1897 he removed to section 6, where he has since resided. He now owns about one-half section of land and has his farms well improved.

Our subject was married, in Wisconsin, March 5, 1888, to Miss Margaret Thomas, a native of New York state. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lynch, namely: Gladys, Madge and Maud. Mr. Lynch has served as township treasurer and chairman of the board of supervisors and takes an active interest in local affairs. He is a man who keeps pace with the times and in all matters of a public nature will be found on the side of right and justice.

ARTHUR EDMONDS is one of the representative general farmers of Traill county and has been a conspicuous figure in the development and extension of the great agricultural and business interests of the eastern part of North Dakota. He lives on the banks of the Red river of the North and owns nineteen hundred and forty acres of land located in Minnesota and North Dakota, and his home, in Caledonia township, Traill county, is one of the most complete and modern residences in his locality.

Our subject was born in Bedford, Canada, August 26, 1856, and was the tenth in order of birth in a family of eleven children born to Joseph and Arvilla (Rouse) Edmonds, natives respectively of Vermont and Canada. The family was of German and Scotch descent.

When our subject was one year of age a home was made in St. Lawrence county, New York, and when he was but three years of age the mother died, and during war times the father, with his second wife and family of children, moved to Houston county, Minnesota, and the father followed farming there. Our subject had eight half brothers and sisters. He left home in 1876 for western Minnesota, and in the spring of 1877, in company with Messrs. Houghton and Steele, went to the Red river valley from New Albion, Iowa. He had no effects and but few dollars in cash and after reaching Caledonia, Traill county, he secured a half-section of government land, but had not the means with which to develop the farm and worked for others at farm work and also in the hotel at Caledonia until 1880. His faith in the future of the country prompted him to purchase two hundred and forty-six acres of land, on which he made a payment of fifty dollars in 1882, and he then went to live on his estate. He has added to his possessions from time to time and his farm has attained generous proportions. The buildings on his home farm are of good construction and his residence is furnished with an artesian well and other conveniences of modern farming, while he has store-houses and an elevator fitted with improvements of the latest pattern. His farm includes one hundred and twenty acres of timber land, and with his own saw mill he has framed most of his buildings. A private ferry connects his land lying on the Dakota side with that in Minnesota. His average wheat crop is about eighteen to twenty bushels per acre, but his crop of 1891 from five hundred acres was sixteen thousand bushels of wheat, No. 1, hard, which sold for eighty-five cents per bushel, and again in 1895 he had a similar yield. Mr. Edmonds has met with severe losses in his struggle to reach comfortable circumstances, and in 1892 lost five thousand dollars' worth of property by fire. Mr. Edmonds is now turning his attention to stock and has a small herd of thoroughbred Hereford cattle and proposes increasing his stock in this direction. His farming operations necessitate the use of forty-five head of horses and employment of ten men regularly. He has reached a station of wealth and influence and enjoys his winter months with his family in California or elsewhere in quest of milder climate.

Our subject was married, March 8, 1881, to Miss Sophia Olson, a native of Sweden. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Edmonds, as follows: Edith, who is completing a musical education at St. Mary's Hall, Minnesota; Elmer, Charles G., Jessie M., Oscar W. and Tracey D. Mr. Edmonds, since taking up his residence in North Dakota, has been actively interested in public affairs and is an attendant of county and state conventions. Politically he is a Republican, and is a member of the I. O. O. F. and I. O. F. He was one of the organizers and is one of the directors and stockholders of the H. D. C. & S. Telephone Company, and is one of the solid men of North Dakota and highly esteemed by a large circle of friends.

DR. MITCHELL M. LOCKERBY, one of the pioneer dentists of North Dakota, has followed his calling in Grand Forks for many years and is widely known as an able practitioner and man of active public spirit. He was born in Odessa, New York, October 14, 1849.

The parents of our subject, Bennajah and Mary A. (Terry) Lockerby, were natives of Connecticut and Massachusetts, respectively. The father was a miller and later moved to Michigan and died near Grand Rapids, that state.

Mr. Lockerby was reared in New York and received his early education in that state and attended the People's College of Havana, New York. He then learned the trade of sawyer and filer, and in 1871 moved to Grand Rapids, Michigan, and later engaged in the general merchandise business at Rockford, Michigan. He began the study of dentistry in 1876 and in 1878 began the practice at Rockford, Michigan, and continued there until 1883. He then came to Grand Forks, North Dakota, and at once established an office and has been engaged in the practice of his profession here since that date. He has met with remarkable success and is now in comfortable circumstances. He owns some business property in the city and also residence property and has gained his possessions by judicious management and persistent efforts. He is a member of the State Dental Society and served as vice-president of the same in 1897.

Our subject was married, in Michigan, in 1875, to Alice G. Young, a native of Michigan. Mr. and Mrs. Lockerby are the parents of one son, upon whom they have bestowed the name of Arnold G. Mr. Lockerby is prominent in secret society circles and holds membership in the Masonic fraternity, in which order he has taken the thirty-second and York Rite degrees. He also is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias. He has devoted his career to his vocation and is a gentleman of progressive, enlightened views, and his standing as an old settler of the county and a citizen of prominence in Grand Forks is well known, and he is deservedly held in high esteem and respect by his fellow men.

WALTER S. NULPH, a pioneer settler of Danton township, Richland county, is successfully pursuing the calling of an agriculturist on section 28. He has acquired a comfortable competence by dint of his own efforts and is one of the substantial and respected men of that community. His home farm is nicely located and well-improved and every convenience to lessen labor is provided, while the details of the work are carefully looked after.

Our subject was born in Strong's Prairie, Adams county, Wisconsin, November 27, 1852. He was but a young boy when he moved with his parents to Winona county, Minnesota, and afterward to Blue Earth county, Minnesota. Our subject went to Richland county, North Dakota, in the spring of 1880 and entered claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 28, in Danton township, where he has since made his home. He is now the owner of five hundred and twenty acres of land and on his home farm has erected substantial and commodious buildings. He has followed the pursuit of agriculture during his entire career and has met with marked success.

Our subject was married, in Blue Earth county, Minnesota, June 25, 1876, to Miss Mary Shroll, a native of Wisconsin. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nulph, three of whom are living, as follows: Pearley E., Walter E. and Raymond. One daughter, Nettie C., died at the age of ten years and one month. Mr. Nulph has ever taken an active interest in the development of that region and is prominent in local affairs. He was the first constable of Danton township and has served his community in various ways.

GUNDER O. JOHNSON, one of the best known and influential pioneer settlers of northwestern Steele county, is a man of excellent characteristics and has acquired a fortune in Dakota by his earnest efforts, supplemented by his integrity and honest dealings. He owns and operates a farm of eight hundred acres and resides on section 34, in Bergen township and engages in diversified farming.

Our subject was born in Hardanger, Bergens (Stift), Norway, January 3, 1855. In a family of five children there were two children older than he and his twin brother, and he was a son of Ole and Inglio (Gunderson) Johnson. The mother died in 1805 and the father now resides in Trempealeau county, Wisconsin. When our subject was about twelve years of age the family embarked for America on the sailing craft "Helvasea," and after a pleasant voyage lasting about seven weeks landed at Quebec, Canada, and from thence immediately went to relatives at Trempealeau, Wisconsin, and the father took a homestead farm. Our subject was employed at farm labor until 1881, when he rented land and began farming for himself and in the spring of 1882 went to Dakota and took the quarter as a homestead on which he is now living. He started from Wisconsin with about one hundred dollars, a team and six or seven head of horned stock and upon his arrival at his land he found himself with little means. With his one light team he managed to break ten or fifteen acres of land and then he and a neighbor combined teams and got comsiderable sod turned. Our subject erected a sod shanty 12x16 feet in the fall of 1882, which was his dwelling until 1888. He cropped about ten acres of wheat and five of oats and barley the first year and lived mostly on his stock and chickens and has devoted much of his attention to the raising of stock and the dairy interests and has added materially to his income from this source. He now has a fine stone basement provided for a dairy. He bought a tree claim soon after taking up his residence in Dakota and has since added to his possessions from time to time.

Our subject was married, in 1881, to Miss Helena Hiltness. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, as follows: Christopher O., deceased; Martin H., deceased, and Martha C. The two sons died of diphtheria in 1886, passing away within a few days of each other. Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are shown on another page. Mr. Johnson is a man of active public spirit and is the present chairman of the township board. He was appointed in 1897 to fill the vacancy caused on the board of county commissioners by the death of Mr. Brown and at the 1898 election was returned to that office by popular ballot and is now serving in that capacity in the second district. He is a staunch Republican in political sentiment and is a man in whom the people repose confidence.

HON. PETER HERBRANDSON. This gentleman is among the public-spirited and energetic citizens of Traill county who will deserve a place in the pages of Dakota's history. He is a gentleman of true worth and his labors are given with but one object, that of advancing and upbuilding the better interests of the country in which he lives. He is the present postmaster of Caledonia, where he has resided since 1879, and is a well known and efficient officer.

Our subject was born in Norway August 9, 1847, and was the third in a family of five children born to Herbran and Bergret (Narvesen) Peterson. He emigrated to the United States in 1864 and settled in Clayton county, Iowa, where he was employed at farming and lumbering until 1876, when he went to Ottertall county, Minnesota, and he soon afterward visited the Red river valley and took a pre-emption claim near Caledonia, in Traill county, and engaged in buying and shipping stock. He took up his residence in Caledonia in 1877.

Our subject was married, in 1873, to Miss Carrie Nelson. The following children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Herbrandson: Emma, Nina, Harry, Clara and James N. Mr. Herbrandson was elected county commissioner in 1878 and served continuously eighteen years, and then after three years was again recently re-elected. This fact alone suggests a popularity seldom enjoyed. He was sent to the fifth and seventh state legislature to represent the interests of his county, and in the fifth session four important bills which have become laws were introduced by him, one relating to paupers and their gaining residence, one relating to bridges and bridge building, one providing for the preservation of coroners' records, and during the seventh session a bill relating to the care of the blind. He is a gentleman of the highest character, possessed of excellent education and a wide knowledge of men and the world, and no man in the county has taken more interest in general matters than he and his influence is widely felt.

OLE A. JOHNSON, an industrious and earnest farmer residing on section 26, in Hall township, is one of the early settlers of Sargent county and has labored for the advancement of that region. He has gained his possessions by his own efforts and is accorded a prominent place in the minds of those among whom he has resided for so many years. His farm bears every evidence of careful management and well-directed labor and he has gained a competence to tide him through his declining years.

Our subject was born in Dane county, Wisconsin, December 14, 1855. He was reared on his father's farm in that county and educated in the common schools, and made his home with his parents until he was seventeen, or in 1872, when he went to Michigan and was there about six months. He then returned home for a brief period and then went to Fort Howard, Wisconsin, and worked in the lumber region for thirteen months. He again returned home for a short time. He then went to Houston county, Minnesota, where he worked by the month at farm labor for some two or three years, after which he went to Fargo, North Dakota, where he was employed for some time in the sale stable of Hanson & Osgood, and then went to Sargent county, in 1882, and entered claim to a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres on section 26, in Hall township, where he has since resided, with the exception of two years, when he was engaged in selling farm machinery in Milnor. He has erected a complete set of nice farm buildings and made every arrangement for the enjoyment of rural life. He has added to his possessions from time to time and is now the owner of three hundred and forty-seven acres of land.

Our subject was married, in Milnor, North Dakota, June 27, 1885, to Miss Sophia M. Larson, who was born in Norway. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, three of whom are now living, as follows: Minnie E., Smith M. and Arthur T. One son, Melvin S., died October 8, 1892.

AUGUST HILKE. Among the prominent early settlers of Cass county the gentleman above named is entitled to special mention. He has remained through discouragements and privations and is now the fortunate possessor of one of the best farms of Cass county, and his residence on section 23, of Everest township, is evidence of his prosperity and thrift. He has gained an assured position as a citizen by his earnest labors for the advancement of the locality in which he chose his home and much of the present solid prosperity of that region is due to his faithful and painstaking efforts.

Our subject was born near Berlin, Germany, November 18, 1837, and was a son of George and Dora (Engle) Huike, both of whom were natives of Germany. His parents came to America in 1852 and settled on a timber farm in Dodge county, Wisconsin. They removed to Winona county, Minnesota, in 1861, where the mother's death occurred. The father died at the home of our subject in North Dakota, aged ninety-five years. Three sons were born to this worthy couple, our subject being the only survivor of the family.

Mr. Hilke was reared in Wisconsin and there began farming and acquired a good property in that state and in 1861 removed to Minnesota, where he purchased land and followed farming some years. He went to Casselton, North Dakota, in 1878, and then purchased a half-section of land, on which he now resides. It was without improvements, but he has transformed it into one of the finest pieces of property to be found in Cass county. He removed his family to the new home in 1880, and has held residence there continuously since.

Our subject was married, in Wisconsin, in 1859, to Minnie Krugmeier, a native of Germany. Mrs. Hilke died in 1884. Eleven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hilke, four sons and seven daughters. Three children died in infancy and the surviving children bear the following names: Amelia, Elizabeth, Minnie, Henry, Ida, Amanda, Annie and Albert. Mr. Hilke was next married to Cora Clark, a native of Minnesota, in 1885. Our subject assisted in the organization of his township and has held various offices therein almost continuously since. He is at present chairman of the board of supervisors, school treasurer and road overseer. He holds membership in the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He keeps pace with the times and in political sentiment is a staunch Democrat.

CHARLIE P. STEARNS, one of Barnes county's leading and representative farmers residing on section 7, township 141, range 58 west, was born in Rushville, Yates county, New York, October 8, 1844, and is a son of George W. and Nancy (Steele) Stearns, both natives of Maine. The mother died in New York at the age of thirty-two years and the father subsequently married Martha Twitchell, also a native of the Pine Tree state. The father was born in Bethel, Maine, in 1810, and his early life was spent upon a farm in that state. He then went to New York, where he engaged in school teaching for a time, but during the last sixteen years of his life conducted a store at Rushville, New York, where his death occurred.

Our subject obtained his education in the district school located near his native village, and during his boyhood and youth he aided his father in the work of the farm. While thus employed the Civil war broke out, and in September, 1861, he responded to his country's call for aid, joining the boys in blue of the Eighth New York Cavalry, which was brigaded with the Third Indiana and the Eighth Illinois Cavalry Regiments. He remained in the service three years, being most of the time on detail duty, and was honorably discharged in the fall of 1864, when he returned to his home in New York.

In April, 1865, Mr. Stearns led to the marriage altar Miss Dora A. Horton, a native of Yates county, New York, born in April, 1843, and to them were born six children, one now deceased. The others, three sons and two daughters, reside in Barnes county, North Dakota. After his marriage Mr. Stearns continued to engage in agricultural pursuits in Yates and Ontario counties, New York, until 1886, when he left the Empire state and came to Barnes county, North Dakota. For one year after locating here he had charge of the Nester farm as foreman, it being one of the largest farms in the county as well as one of the best improved. In 1890 he purchased the place on which he now resides. In his farming operations here he has met with most excellent success, and was at one time the owner of more than twelve hundred acres of land, but has since disposed of all but five hundred and sixty acres, having from time to time given large tracts to his children as they have left the parental roof and gone to homes of their own. He is a thorough and skillful agriculturist and an upright, honorable business man who commands the respect and confidence of all with whom he comes in contact. He has always cast his ballot with the Republican party, but has never sought political honors, preferring to give his undivided attention to his business interests.

His father was a native of the Empire state and was a farmer by occupation. He died in St. Croix county, Wisconsin, and the mother of our subject is also deceased.

Mr. Letson, when a child of two years, moved with his parents to St. Croix county, Wisconsin, where he attended the district schools and assisted his father with the farm work until he attained his majority, when he secured a position in Hudson, Wisconsin, and worked there three years, going from thence to River Falls, Wisconsin, where he engaged in clerking until 1882, when he went to Dickey county, North Dakota. He looked over the country in a general way and returned to Wisconsin until the spring of 1883, when he moved to Elden township, where he has since resided. He has about thirty head of cattle, three hundred sheep and fifteen horses on his farm.

He emigrated to America in 1867 and went direct to Minnesota and there assisted on the home farm and later purchased land and engaged in farming there until 1882, when he went to Cass county, North Dakota, and settled in Everest township, where he purchased a farm. He was also engaged in the mercantile business in Everest for some time. He has added to his acreage from time to time and now owns eleven hundred and sixty acres of Cass county land. He is president of the Mutual Insurance Company and is accounted a substantial man.

Our subject was married, in 1868, to Wilhelmina Dittmer, a native of Germany. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Meilicke, as follows: Martha, Arthur, Lydia, Edward, and Emma. Mr.

He at once located on section 27, in Danton township, and has thoroughly improved his farm, which now covers four hundred and twenty acres. He has erected a complete set of good farm buildings and provided modern means for the care of his products and stock. He is also engaged to some extent in the carpenter's trade, and despite his advanced age is active in his labors.

Our subject was married in Jefferson county, New York, to Mary Ann Stratten, a native of Vermont, who was born October 23, 1831. Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Springer, as follows: Hiram A.; Martin J.; Alonzo; Eleanor; Grant; Herbert; J. Mr. Prestrud was born in Norway, February 25, 1860. When eight years of age he came with the family, consisting of five children and the parents, Anders and Martha (Hariestad) Prestrud, to America, locating in Fillmore county, Minnesota. He and his brother built a frame house in 1882 on the dividing line between their farms, and they lived together until 1894. Here his father worked at his trade, and the family soon afterward went to Welton, Minnesota, where our subject engaged in the hotel business in company with his father. He went to Sioux Falls, South Dakota, in the spring of 1858, and took government land within one mile of that place, which land was then unsurveyed. He enlisted in the Tenth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry in August, 1862, and spent most of that year in fighting the Indians, and witnessed the hanging of thirty-eight Indians at Mankato, Minnesota. He was one year in the service in North and South Dakota, and in 1863 went to the south, and was through Missouri, Mississippi and Alabama, and afterwards participated in the battle of Mobile, and later was severely wounded at the battle of Nashville, and in September, 1865, was mustered out of the service. He then returned to his home in Minnesota, where he followed farming, and also held an interest in the hotel which his father conducted. He went to Jamestown, North Dakota, in 1879, and entered claim to land as a homestead and tree claim three miles from this city. GEORGE D. SLINGSBY, one of the well-known agriculturists of Riverside township, in Steele county, has a pleasant home on section 34, and is a man of honest principles and industrious habits. It is not until recent years that he has prospered in his chosen calling, owing to failure of crops in whole or part, but despite the early discouragements, he has worked persistently and is now the owner of one of the fine farms of that locality.

Our subject was born in Winnebago county, Wisconsin, October 23, 1850, and was the eldest son born to George and Elizabeth (Slingsby) Slingsby, who are now living in California. HENRY KROGH. A great many of the inhabitants of this state are of foreign birth. The old world has furnished not only needed workmen, skilled and unskilled, but enterprising merchants, manufacturers, artists and art dealers upon our marts of trade. These foreign-born citizens have also naturally embraced the various professions, where they have proved themselves useful, talented and influential. Among these professional men must be numbered Henry Krogh, an attorney of Fargo, and the Danish vice-consul for North and South Dakota.

He was born at Elsinore, Denmark, November 8, 1853, and was reared and educated in his native land, attending the colleges of that country, including the agricultural college at Copenhagen. Soon after settling here he commenced the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in January, 1890. Prior to this time he was associated with Jacob Lowell and F. J. Thompson in practice before the United States land office, and has followed that line of business up to the present time. He is also interested in the real estate business, and has been eminently successful since coming to this state. He is recognized as one of the prominent and influential citizens of his community, and in 1882 was appointed Danish vice-consul for the territory of Dakota, a position he has since most acceptably filled. He takes considerable interest in political affairs, but has never sought nor desired public office. Socially he is one of the oldest Masons in the state, and is also a member of the Modern Woodmen of America.

the lumber woods for the winter months. He was engaged at farm work near Fargo during the summer of 1885, and in the spring of 1886 bought a team of horses and worked for others during the spring and then went to his tree claim in Eddy county, and broke seventy-three acres of his land and boarded with a neighbor. He did not build his residence until 1888, and followed farming with oxen from 1891-95. He engaged in wheat and flax raising, and has met with success. He has about six hundred acres under cultivation, and one hundred and sixty acres in grass and pasture land, and on his home farm has a complete set of substantial buildings, and all machinery for the conduct of the place, and his farm bears evidence of painstaking care in its operation.

He went to Griggs county, North Dakota, in 1883 and filed claim to the land on which he now resides. He has held numerous offices in his township and the honor of christening the township was conferred upon him. He is a Republican in political sentiment.

ERWIN E. TOWN. Among the better class of agriculturists, whose farms evidence enterprise and painstaking care, this gentleman stands in a foremost rank. He has added valuable improvements to his estate and is one of the substantial men of Dickey county. He makes his home on section 11, township 129, range 65, of Spring Valley township, and every appointment bespeaks the good taste of the family.

Our subject was born on a farm in Dane county, Wisconsin, January 4, 1863, and there attended school and resided until eighteen years of age. He was the third in order of birth in a family of eleven children born to Allen and Jane (Haggert) Town. His father was a farmer by occupation and died in Columbia county, Wisconsin, in 1898 and the mother died in the same county in 1892.

After completing his education our subject began railroad work between Winona, Minnesota, and Harvard, Illinois, and continued thus engaged four and a half years, when he returned home for a short time and in March, 1886, went to Dickey county, North Dakota, where he filed claim to land and began farming. He and Mrs. Town each own one quarter-section of land and their home farm is equipped with the most modern and improved machinery and buildings and every arrangement made to lessen the labor incident to farm life.

EBEN W. L. CARKIN. In Hillsboro township, Traill county, there is quite a settlement of New Englanders, whose thrifty habits have brought them success in a country where extravagant outlay has accomplished little or nothing more. Comfortable homes, good schools and culture and refinement are evidenced in their every-day life and surroundings and as one of this class the gentleman above named is entitled to prominent mention. Mr. Carkin has a fine farm of seven hundred acres and his home in section 28 is a model in every particular, although less ostentatious in appearance than many of those of the so-called "bonanza farmers" of the country. He has pushed steadily forward and by perseverance and economical habits and good judgment has acquired a home of comfort and easy circumstances.

Our subject was born in Appleton, Knox county, Maine, July 10, 1850, and was the fourth in a family of six children born to Isaac and Sabra (Bump) Carkin, both of whom are deceased. He left his home when nineteen years of age and obtained employment in a shoe factory at Marblehead, Massachusetts, and after about seven years of that work, during which time he had obtained a modest bank account, he returned to his native state and in Appleton he embarked in the general merchandise business and conducted this extensively until 1882. In the spring of that year the "westward ho" fever seized him and he went to North Dakota and was soon established on a farm in the Red river valley, boarding himself and following his ox-team and plow, an employment wholly foreign to that followed by him for the preceding thirteen years. His family joined him in 1884 and have resided in North Dakota continuously since. He has purchased additional land and improved his farm and has an excellent property, which yields an abundant crop of grain annually.

Our subject was married to Miss Ada L. York, in 1882. Mrs. Carkin was for several years engaged in the school rooms of New England and is always interested in all pertaining to educational advancement. For the purpose of giving their children the best school advantages they reside in Hillsboro during the winter months. Their children are as follows: John H., Theone, Howard E. and Everett O. Mr. Carkin is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Independent Order of Foresters. He is identified with the Democratic party in politics and has mixed freely in public affairs, and considering the fact that his party is in the minority, he has proven himself a decidedly popular man. He was elected county commissioner in 1897 and is now serving as chairman of the county board. For many years he has served as township treasurer and has assisted in the upbuilding of schools in Hillsboro township and city. He is a gentleman of broad views and well merits his high standing.

JAMES G. BROWN. The farming and stock raising interests of Cass county have a worthy representative in the gentleman whose name introduces this review. He is engaged extensively in agricultural pursuits in Gill township and has a model farm, the direct result of well-directed labor and economical methods. He is highly esteemed by his fellow men and enjoys well-merited success.

Our subject was born in county Formagh, Ireland, January 7, 1857, and was a son of James and Mary (Tichbourn) Brown, natives of the same county. His parents emigrated to America in 1875 and settled in Bruce county, Canada, where the father died in 1890, aged eighty-three years. He was a farmer and stock raiser and prospered in his calling. The mother of our subject resides with him in North Dakota. The maternal grandfather of our subject, George Tichbourn, lived in Canada, to the advanced age of ninety-three years.

Our subject was one of five children, three sons and two daughters. His brothers are deceased and his sister resides in Canada. Mr. Brown was educated in Ireland, receiving an academic education until sixteen years of age and in 1873 left home and started for the United States. He landed at Portland, Maine, with fourteen cents in money and soon after was taken seriously ill and in consequence was soon many dollars in debt. Within nine months, however, he was able to land one hundred dollars from his savings and he remained in Portland one year and then removed to Port Hope, Canada, where he remained three years and engaged in the manufacturing of brick and tile. He then went to Cass county, North Dakota, in the spring of 1880 and purchased a relinquishment and filed claim to the quarter-section of land on which he still resides. He began the improvement of his farm at once and the following year went to South Dakota and entered claim to land near Aberdeen, where he lived two years, and then returned to Cass county, North Dakota, where he has followed farming and stock raising continuously since. He ships a large amount of stock annually and operates a section of land, on which he has placed improvements which entitle it to rank among the finest farms of the county.

Our subject was married, in Canada, in 1875, to Jane Collins, a native of Canada, of Irish parentage. Eleven children, four sons and seven daughters, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown. Mr. Brown is active in public affairs of local importance and was one of the organizers of Gill township and was the first treasurer of the same and has served as chairman of the township board and also assessor. He was elected county commissioner in 1898 and is now serving as chairman of the board. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and assisted in the organization and erection of the church edifice of the Gill church and was also instrumental in the erection of the school building on the same corner of the township. He is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. EVEN H. BAKKE, who owns and operates a fine farm on section 26, Norman township, has for many years been one of the most highly esteemed and valued citizens of Barnes county. He is of foreign birth, but his duties of citizenship have been performed with a loyalty equal to that of any native son of America and when the nation was imperiled by rebellion he went to the defense of the Union and protected the cause of his adopted country on many a southern battle field. A portrait of Mr. Bakke appears on another page.

Mr. Bakke was born in Norway, September 19, 1833, and continued his residence in that country until 1850, when he came to America with his parents, Hans and Martha (Anderson) Bakke, also natives of the Land of the Midnight Sun. The father was born during the latter part of the eighteenth century. In their family were nine children, of whom our subject is the eldest.

On their emigration to the United States, the family located near the village of Cambridge, in Dane county, Wisconsin, where Even H. Bakke completed his education by a short attendance at the district schools. He aided his father in the operation of the home farm until the Civil war, when he could no longer remain quietly at home. Hardly had the echoes from Fort Sumter's guns died away when he enlisted, in April, 1861, in Company K, Third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, which went into camp at Fond du Lac, Wisconsin and on the 5th of July was ordered to Harper's Ferry to do garrison duty. Our subject was in most of the important engagements in which the Army of the Potomac took part, including the battles of Boliver Heights, Winchester, Cedar Mountain, Pope's campaign, Antietam, Chancellorsville, Beverly Ford, Gettysburg, Resaca, Dallas, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Savannah, Bentonville and Averysboro. He also helped quell the draft riots in New York City and participated in the grand review at Washington, D. C. Although he was in many battles and skirmishes he fortunately escaped uninjured and was never taken prisoner.

After his discharge in the fall of 1865, Mr. Bakke returned to his old home in Wisconsin, where he remained until the following fall. He then went to Monona county, Iowa, where he purchased land and lived until the spring of 1880, which witnessed his arrival in Barnes county, North Dakota. He filed a claim where he now resides and has since given his time and attention to the improvement and cultivation of his land. It is the model farm of Norman township, being most pleasantly located and supplied with all the modern accessories and conveniences needed by the progressive farmer of the nineteenth century.

On the 10th of May, 1866, Mr. Bakke was united in marriage, in Dane county, Wisconsin, with Miss Johanna Gullickson, a daughter of Knut and Maria Gullickson. Our subject and his wife have no children of their own, but have an adopted daughter, Hilda. They are highly respected and esteemed by all who know them, and their circle of friends seems only limited by their circle of acquaintances.

JOHN MARESH, a well-known farmer and highly respected citizen living on section 24, township 141, range 59 west, Barnes county, North Dakota, was born on the 23d of March, 1851, in the village of Rodna, Bohemia, Austria, and is a son of Mathias Mares, a farmer and lumber merchant, who was born in Bohemia in 1800 and died in 1885. Reared in his native land, our subject began his education in the schools of Polmany and when between nine and ten years of age went to Tabor, where he attended school until about twelve years old. For one season he was a student in a school in the city of Eglan, Moravia, and while there acquired a knowledge of the German language.

After six months spent at home with his parents, Mr. Mares returned to Tabor, where he served an apprenticeship to the miller's trade and when he had mastered that occupation worked at it in different cities throughout Austria. He also traveled in upper Moravia and lower Hungary for the purpose of gaining further knowledge concerning his trade. Subsequently he took charge of a mill at Tabor and remained at that place until he sailed for America in the fall of 1868. After stopping for a short time in New York he came west and located in Iowa City, Iowa, where he worked in a mill until the fall of 1869. On leaving there he traveled through that state and Nebraska for a time and then went to work on the Missouri river at Sioux City, Iowa, but not being pleased with his employment he abandoned it after three days' trial and enlisted, in 1869, in the regular army, being assigned to the Twenty-second Infantry. For a short time he was stationed at Sioux City and then was ordered to Fort Randall, South Dakota, which at that time was the most important post on the Missouri river. He did scout duty and saw much hard fighting against the Indians of the great Northwest and took part in some of the historic Indian battles, notably the one in which Lane Deer, the great Sioux chief, was killed at his lodge. General N. A. Miles was commander of the United States forces at that time and Mr. Mares has served under many other famous Indian fighters, including Generals Stanley, Terry, Brooks and Otis. In 1877 he secured his discharge from the army after one full term of five years and three years of another. In the fall of 1877 he came to Valley City, North Dakota, where he remained until the following spring and then took up land where he now resides and has since devoted his energies to agricultural pursuits with marked success, becoming owner of seven hundred and twenty acres of valuable farm land.

In 1880 Mr. Mares was married, in Valley City, to Miss Mary Paddon, who was born in Wisconsin, in 1860, and they have become the parents of ten children. Mr. Mares's life has been one of vast and varied experiences, as he has met with more hardships than usually fall to the lot of one man, yet he has come out of it all with success emblazoned upon his banner and to-day owns one of the best farms in the Sheyenne valley.

ERWARD M. DARROW, M. D. In comparison of the relative value to mankind of the various professions and pursuits it is widely recognized that none is so important as the medical profession. From the cradle to the grave human destiny is largely in the hands of the physician and the most successful of these is he, who through love of fellow men, gives his time and attention to the relief of human suffering. One of the ablest representatives of his noble calling is Dr. Edward M. Darrow, the pioneer physician and surgeon of Fargo and the Red river valley.

He was born in Winnebago county, Wisconsin, January 16, 1855, and is a son of Daniel C. and Isabelle (Murray) Darrow, both natives of New York. The father, who was a farmer and contractor by occupation, went to Wisconsin when it was still a territory, and there spent the remainder of his life. He had two sons who took up the medical profession, the other being now a physician of Moorhead, Minnesota. The grandfather of our subject, Elezer Darrow, was also a native of New York, and was a son of Daniel Darrow, of Connecticut, who served as a soldier in the Continental army during the Revolutionary war and died at the extreme old age of ninety-six years.

Mr. Darrow, of this review, was reared in his native county, where he attended school for some time and later was a student at the Oshkosh high school and the Lawrence University at Appleton, Wisconsin. In 1874, before leaving college, he began the study of medicine under Dr. Thomas Russell, of Oshkosh and the following year entered Rush Medical College of Chicago, from which he was graduated in 1878. He commenced practice at Fargo in the spring of that year and has prosecuted his profession here continuously since. He has visited the principal hospitals of England, Scotland, France and also of this country, where he obtained much valuable knowledge not to be gained in text books and he is constantly improving on his own and others' methods, being one of the most progressive physicians of the state. In 1878 he started the first Cass county hospital, which is still in existence, and he enjoys an excellent private practice. He was the first superintendent of the board of health of Dakota territory and issued the first license to practice within its borders. He was also surgeon-general under Governor Burke; was county physician for years, and is still a member of the insanity board, with which he has been connected for some time.

In 1879 Dr. Darrow was united in marriage with Miss Clara Dillon, also a native of Wisconsin, and to them have been born five children: Mary H., Clara E., Kent E., Frank I. and Daniel C. Politically, the Doctor is an ardent Democrat and takes an active interest in the success of his party. He is one of the few thirty-third-degree Masons in this country, and also belongs to the Knights of Pythias, the State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. His entire life has been devoted to his profession and he has met with the most excellent success in practice, thereby gaining a reputation second to none in the state. His kindly and benevolent spirit is manifest by the readiness with which he responds to a call that comes from one from whom he knows he can receive no possible remuneration.

GEORGE F. PEABODY. The agricultural interests of township 147, range 66, in Foster county, have an excellent representative in the gentleman above named. His fine estate consists of four hundred and eighty acres, is well situated and thoroughly improved and has been under careful tillage for several years. The buildings upon it include a substantial residence, barn, sheds, windmill and every other structure that will add to the convenience of those engaged in the work on the place.

Mr. Peabody was the eldest in a family of four children, three of whom were daughters, and was raised in Mansonville, Canada, and worked in his father's store. He went to North Dakota, in 1884, and located in Stutsman county, but soon afterward entered claim to land in Foster county. He spent the first two years in Pingree, employed at farm labor, and in 1886 began farming in Foster county, on section 4, in township 147, range 66. He built a claim shanty 6x10 feet and had no means with which to further his work and his two teams were three oxen and one horse, with which he farmed for three years, and had a sod barn for shelter of his stock. He entered claim to land as a pre-emption in 1886, and as a homestead in 1892 and has engaged principally in grain raising. His best crop was in 1891, but he could not get it threshed until the following spring and the profit of the crop was lost. He keeps eleven horses and about thirty-six head of cattle and has met with success as a general farmer. He and his father were associated together in their farming and together passed through pioneer experiences and the partnership was continued until the father's death in 1898.

Stephen B. Bartlett received his education in the common and high schools of New York state and on leaving the latter at once began the study of law in 1867 at Warsaw, New York, and was admitted to practice by the supreme court of that state at Syracuse, in 1873. He began the practice of his profession at Warsaw and continued there until 1880, when he removed to Lake City, Minnesota, and practiced there two years. He removed to Casselton in the spring of 1882 and has followed the practice of his profession in that city continuously since that date. He formed a partnership in 1888 with V. R. Lovill, which was dissolved in 1898. Mr. Bartlett is also extensively interested in farming and operates an extensive tract in Traverse county, Minnesota.

Our subject was married, August 5, 1875, to Miss Cora I. Chamberlin, a native of Wyoming county, New York. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett, as follows: William K., now attending the medical department of the State University of Minnesota; Elizabeth and Lawrence M. Mr. Bartlett is a Mason of long standing and for five years occupied the position of worshipful master of the local lodge of Casselton. He served as district attorney in 1888 and 1889 and ably discharged the duties of that office. He was nominated by the Democratic party for attorney-general of the state, but refused to accept and has also refused to have his name used for other important offices in the county and state. While a resident of New York he entered the field as a public speaker for General Hancock in his home county and has been associated with the Democratic party throughout his career and is an active worker for party principles and a recognized leader.

FRANK P. WRIGHT. The rapid development and almost marvelous growth of North Dakota has, to a great extent, enriched many men by the increase in value of their lands, assisted by their own industry and efforts in farming. Among this class is the gentleman whose name introduces this sketch. His home is on section 8, township 140, range 58 west, Barnes county. He is not only one of the most prosperous agriculturists of his community, but is also one of its most highly esteemed citizens and an honored pioneer of the county.

Mr. Wright was born on a farm in Genesee county, New York, November 3, 1849, and is a son of Harry and Mary Ann (Pierson) Wright, the former a native of Vermont, the latter of Connecticut. His father became a resident of New York at the age of nine years and there followed farming throughout his active business life. He was born in Rutland, Vermont, January 22, 1806, and died in 1887. The mother was born at Lyme, Connecticut, October 18, 1814, and died May 6, 1891. William E. Wright, a brother of our subject, was a soldier of the Civil war and came very nearly being taken as a prisoner to Andersonville, but succeeding in making his escape, thus avoiding what might otherwise have proved a living death. Amzi Wright, grandfather of our subject, aided in the defense of the country in the war of 1812.

The early life of Frank P. Wright was passed in an uneventful manner upon the home farm until eighteen years of age, attending the district schools of the neighborhood. He then entered Wyoming College, where he was a student for three winters. In 1872 he went to Toronto, Canada, and was foreman of one of the large lumber yards of that city for one year, after which he returned to the old home in the Empire state, remaining there until coming to this state in March, 1874.

Mr. Wright arrived in Barnes county during that month, he found only two shanties and a water tank occupying the present site of Valley City and at that time the Northern Pacific trains only ran as far as Bismarck, while during the winter they stopped altogether. It was not until the winter of 1876-1877 that regular trains were put on the road. Game, such as deer and antelope, was found in abundance and at any time the hunter had ample opportunity of indulging his love in the chase. Mr. Wright's early neighbors were half-breed Indians, many of whom lived along the river at that time. He filed a claim on the northeast quarter of section 8, township 140, range 58 west, in 1874, and from the unbroken prairie has developed the fine farm on which he now resides. His entire holdings in Barnes county now amount to thirteen hundred acres of land, as he has steadily prospered in his new home, being enterprising, energetic and industrious. His home is beautifully located in the Sheyenne river, is well supplied with all modern improvements in the way of buildings and machinery and is undoubtedly one of the most desirable pieces of farm property in the county. Being a man of refined taste and a lover of the beautiful wherever found, Mr. Wright justly appreciates his place.

On the 26th of December, 1870, in Valley City, he was united in marriage with Miss Jennie Coe, who was born in Waupun, Wisconsin, April 3, 1850. Her father, Dr. S. P. Coe, published the "Valley City Times," which was the first paper printed in Barnes county, and which is now known as the "Times Record." Our subject and his wife had two children: May, who was born in 1881 and died in 1883, and Harry G., who was born in 1884 and died in 1897. He has acted as president of the state normal school board for four years. He was also a member of the first board of county commissioners of what is now Barnes county, but before the county was organized, being appointed to that position by Governor John L. Pennington in 1874. He has always been found true to every trust reposed in him, either in public or private life and is ranked among the best citizens of his community.

WALTER D. HUFFMAN, the popular proprietor of the Commercial Hotel and one of the leading livymen of Ludden, is a young man of excellent business tact and has made a place for himself as a worthy citizen among his associates.

Our subject was born in Sandusky county, Ohio, February 25, 1860, and was a son of Daniel W. and Josephine (Hathaway) Huffman. His father was captain of the Seventy-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry and was a member of Company C, serving four years in the Civil war. He was severely wounded in the leg and was a prisoner at Mobile for nine months. Our subject had the sword which his father carried through many of the hotly contested battles. The mother of our subject died in Ohio in 1893 and the father is now a resident of Upper Sandusky, that state. His mother was a descendant of the Mayflower pilgrims.

In a family of four children, three sons and one daughter, our subject was the third in order of birth. He removed with his parents to Martin, Ohio, when he was one year of age, residing there until he was fourteen years of age, and there received his early schooling. The family then moved to Dickey county, North Dakota, where our subject worked on his father's farm until 1892, in which year he went to Ludden, Dickey county, since which time he has conducted the hotel and livery business. He has met with success, and his patronage is steadily increasing.

Our subject was married in Ludden, Dickey county, North Dakota, March 15, 1892, to Miss Agnes B. Bennett, a native of Erie county, New York. Mrs. Huffman was born April 27, 1867, and was a daughter of Hiram and Esther Bennett. She went to Iona county, Michigan, when a child, and there grew to womanhood. Her mother died in Ludden, and her father survives and makes his home in the village. Mr. and Mrs. Huffman are the parents of two children, named as follows: Joseph and Emery B. Mr. Huffman is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Modern Woodmen of America. He is prominent in public affairs of his township and has held various offices of trust.

He is a man of excellent characteristics, and although a foreign-born citizen, has resided in this country from childhood, and at all times works for his adopted country's best interests.

Mr. Gebhart was born in Austria April 11, 1869, and is a son of Wenzel and Catherine (Sidler) Gebhart, who now reside with our subject. When he was five years of age the family emigrated to America, and located in Calumet county, Wisconsin, where he grew to manhood, and resided until he went to Richland county, North Dakota, in the spring of 1888. He purchased three hundred and twenty-four acres of land on section 21, in Summit township, which he still owns, and has added such improvements as are found on a model farm.

Our subject was married in Summit township, Richland county, November 6, 1894, to Miss Mary Schreiber, a daughter of Albert Schreiber, of Summit township, a sketch of whose life will appear elsewhere in this volume. One daughter has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Gebhart, upon whom they have bestowed the name of Alma. Mr. Gebhart and family are members of St. John's Catholic church. Our subject takes an active interest in local affairs, and is a member of the board of supervisors of Summit township and road overseer. He is one of the enterprising young men of that locality, and is highly esteemed by his associates.

JAMES ELTON, treasurer of Grand Forks county, is one of the prominent and influential men of North Dakota. He is a wide-awake and energetic citizen of true public spirit and is worthy the confidence reposed in him by the people among whom he resides. His portrait will be found on another page.

Our subject was born in Kent, England, September 30, 1846, and is a son of Robert and Eliza (Turner) Elton, both of whom were natives of England and the family was one of the old families of that country.

Mr. Elton was reared and educated in England and attended college at Cheltenham and after completing his studies spent four years there in farming. He came to America in 1870 and entered the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company as clerk and spent one year at Winnipeg. He went to Georgetown, Minnesota, in 1871, and the following year came to Grand Forks and remained in their employ five years. He then engaged in boating for Kittson & Hill, running on the Red river between Grand Forks and Winnipeg as boat clerk and followed that calling until 1880, when he engaged as clerk in the United States land office and filled that position at Grand Forks and at Devil's Lake until 1886 and was then appointed deputy treasurer of Grand Forks county and acted as such three years and received the practical training which fitted him for his present official position. He was then appointed register of the land office by President Harrison in 1889 and served four years in that capacity, and then engaged in the real estate business. He followed the same until 1898, when he was elected county treasurer and is now ably discharging the duties of that office. He has served as alderman of the city for some years and was also a member of the school board for many years. He was appointed register of deeds on the

He came to America in 1872, and resided six years in Winona, Minnesota. He went from thence to Richland county, North Dakota, in May, 1878, and entered a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 34, in Summit township, which is his present home farm. He has added to his acreage from time to time, and is now the fortunate possessor of three quarter-sections of land, and is engaged in general farming. A part of his possessions are in Wilkin county, Minnesota.

Our subject was married in Prussia to Katie Gerlasky. Mr. and Mrs. Schreiber are the parents of seven children, as follows: Michael, August, Adolph, Mary (now Mrs. Adam Gebhart, of Summit township), Vena, Matilda and Gertrude. Mr. Schreiber is well known in Richland county as a man of true worth and energetic spirit.

HON. LARS H. LARSON. This gentleman needs no introduction to the people of Traill county. He is well known as a pioneer settler, who is engaged extensively in farming and stock raising, and has acquired a fortune by those characteristics which place him in a foremost rank as a citizen and business man. He resides in Bloomfield township, and his land, comprising one thousand four hundred and forty acres, is within that township.

Our subject was born near Christiania, Norway, May 7, 1853, and was a son of Lars and Christe Herbrandson. He is next to the youngest of five surviving children, in a family consisting of twelve children, and in 1854 came to America with his parents. The family landed at New York and settled on land in Fillmore county, Minnesota. The father died when our subject was ten years of age, and the mother succeeded in keeping the family together and operated the farm for two years, when she, too, was called to her rest, and the family became separated. Our subject lived one year with his married sister, and then entered a general store at Newburgh, Minnesota, working one year and also attending school. He then went to Spring Grove, Houston county, and for three years worked summers and attended school winters, the determination to obtain a good education being instilled in him by his father. He then hired out for three years at farm labor, and in 1873 rented a farm and followed farming near Houston until 1879. He met with severe reverses during the last year there, and then packed his household effects, and with about twenty head of cattle and horses started for Fargo, South Dakota. He went to the Elm river country and settled near the north branch of the Elm river, and secured a pre-emption claim and later purchased a homestead right. A frame building was erected at a cost of about $180, and he began to open up a wheat farm, and was thus engaged exclusively until 1890, and then under the firm name of Larson & Johnson established in the machine business in Hillsboro, and also dealt in horses. After six years he sold his interests and devoted his attention to farming and stock raising. He now has a herd of about twenty-five registered Shorthorn and Durham cattle, and will devote much attention to raising stock of this class. He has accumulated his fine estate by purchase, and on his farm has a private elevator of twenty thousand bushels capacity. The Hillsboro Banking Company was formed in 1890, and our subject was president and operated the business four years. Our subject continued on the farm after his father's death until 1898, and engaged principally in stock raising. He established a general store in Cathay in 1898, in company with Thomas Burris, in the building which he had erected in 1894, and in January, 1900, he purchased his partner's interest, and the firm is now Hardy Brothers. They handle a general line of merchandise, and are successful in their business. Mr. Hardy was appointed postmaster of Cathay in 1897 by President McKinley. He had about six hundred acres of his farm under tation at the time he left the place, and had erected a complete set of good farm buildings and made a made a success of agricultural pursuits. JOHN W. MURPHY, one of the leading farmers of Foster county, is a large land owner of that region. His real estate amounts to six hundred and forty acres, the home farm being in township 165, range 45, which is well improved in every particular and forms a home of great comfort and even luxury. Mr. Murphy has accumulated this fine estate by honest industry and is highly esteemed as a worthy citizen throughout the county. His many friends will be pleased to find a portrait of Mr. Murphy in this volume.

Our subject was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, August 2, 1856, and is a son of Michael and Margaret (Houlihan) Murphy, both of whom were natives of Ireland. His father came to America about 1853 and shortly after the birth of our subject the family settled in Fayette county, Iowa, where the father followed farming. The grandparents of our subject were also farmers by occupation.

Mr. Murphy is the third in a family of eight children and was raised on a farm and attended the country schools. He resided with his parents until May 10, 1887, when he reached Fargo, North Dakota, one of a party of four (all relatives). He worked for the Walter Wood Machine Company and the Deering Harvester Company and entered claim to land as a homestead about fifteen miles northwest of Fargo. He erected a shanty 10x12 feet on the land, but did not engage to any extent in farming the land and in 1883 sold the property for two thousand dollars. He went to Foster county, in 1882, and located on what later proved to be the southwest quarter of section 6, township 145, range 65, and built a small shanty and began farming in 1884. The Jamestown Northern Railroad was not built yet and he hauled supplies and lumber from Jamestown and he and his brother, James Murphy, lived together on the farm and were in partnership, this partnership lasting until 1891. Our subject now has a farm of six hundred and forty acres and operates about one thousand acres of land annually. He has erected one of the finest residences in the community, which supplies every convenience and comfort. He has a commodious horse barn 66x100 feet, and a cattle barn 50x200 feet, granary, windmill, plenty of good water for two hundred head of cattle, five wells on the place, fifteen acres of forest trees near the house and keeps about thirty horses. He has plenty of machinery for the lessening of labor and the economical conduct of the place and raises hogs, cattle and draft horses, aside from grain raising. He has met with eminent success and his farm in its present condition is in striking contrast to the land as he first began farming upon it.

Our subject was married, in 1885, to Miss Mary Fitzimmons, who was born in Fayette county, Iowa. Mrs. Murphy's father, Terrence Fitzimmons, was a miner in his early life and later followed farming. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Murphy, as follows: Loretta, Raymond, Terrence and Arthur. Mr. Murphy is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. Politically, he is a Democrat and is a man who keeps pace with the times and is strong in his convictions. Mrs. Murphy's mother is Johanna Fitzimmons, whose maiden name was Malone. She now lives in Fayette county, Iowa, and is now about fifty-seven years of age. Mr. Murphy has made his own way in life and has been very successful.

NEWTON OLSON, who is passing his declining years amid the pleasant surroundings of a country home, is one of the early settlers of Ransom county. He is the owner of one of the fine farms of Preston township, and has gained his possessions by a well spent life. His residence, now in course of construction on section 19, is one of the best in the locality, and when completed will furnish every comfort and many of the luxuries of rural life.

Our subject was born near Bergen, Norway, in December, 1829. He lived in his native country until about sixteen years of age, when in company with his parents he came to America. The family located near Chicago, Illinois, and later went to Rushford, Fillmore county, Minnesota, where our subject ran a ferry across the Root river and estab-

HENRY P. FOLEY. The wealth of Sargent county is due largely to the well regulated farms, and Hall township is not without its share of the same. One of these carefully cultivated tracts of land belongs to the gentleman above named. It is located in section 27, and consists of one hundred and sixty acres, on which buildings of substantial construction and good design have been erected.

Mr. Foley is a native of Norway, and was born October 9, 1859. When he was but four and a half years of age he came to America with his parents, and the family lived one year in Illinois, and then settled in Winneshick county, Iowa, on a farm, and there our subject grew to manhood, and continued to reside until 1882, when the family went to Sargent county, North Dakota, and settled in section 27, in Hall township, where our subject and his parents, Peter and Inga (Thompson) Foley, have since resided.

Henry P. Foley was married in Hall township, Sargent county, North Dakota, July 21, 1895, to Miss Selma Nygaard. Mr. and Mrs. Foley are the parents of two children, as follows: Julius O. and Marie O. The family are members of the Norwegian Lutheran church. Mr. Foley takes an active part in all affairs of a public nature, and has served as chairman of the board of supervisors of Hall township. He is a gentleman of industrious habits, and careful methods, and has gathered about him the comforts of a country home, and provided for the time when he rests from active labors.

HOMER D. LANDIS, who stands among the foremost men of his calling in Richland county, is pursuing farming on section 23, of Devillo township. He has a well-improved estate, and although a resident of that locality a comparatively short time, has gained the respect of the entire community.

Mr. Landis was born in Gorham township, Fulton county, Ohio, October 9, 1859. He was reared on his father's farm in that township, and received a common school education. He resided with his parents until he reached his majority, when he went to Grass Lake, Jackson county, Michigan, where he engaged in farming for some years. He was then employed as section foreman on the Michigan Central Railroad for four and a half years, and on leaving Grass Lake went to Minneapolis, Minnesota. Here he followed the livery business chiefly for four and a half years, and in April, 1887, went to Richland county, North Dakota. He purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 23, in Devillo township, and it is on that tract he now makes his home. He has added to his original purchase, and is now the owner of one half-section of land, on which he has erected a complete set of good buildings, and is prepared to enjoy the comforts of country life.

Mrs. Landis died in Devillo township, Richland county, May 10, 1896, leaving two children, as follows: Arthur D. and Clara L. Mr. Landis married Miss Ethel L. HORACE G. SCOTT, one of the leading attorneys of Casselton, is a member of the firm of Pollack & Scott of that city, and enjoys an ever-increasing and lucrative practice. He is a gentleman of intelligence and true worth, and his standing as a citizen is beyond question.

Our subject was born at Hudson, St. Croix county, Wisconsin, April 26, 1856, and was a son of William W. and Agnes (Cavin) Scott, natives respectively of Maine and Ireland. His father was a lumberman, and moved to Wisconsin about 1853, where he still resides.

Horace G. Scott was reared and educated in Wisconsin in the public schools and Hinckley Military Academy, and later took a course in the State University. He then began reading law at Hudson, and in 1882 went to Trail county, North Dakota, and entered claim to land and in 1885 resumed the study of law with R. M. Pollock. He was admitted to the bar in 1887, and later spent two years in California, and in 1890 formed a partnership with R. M. Pollock, under the firm name of Pollock & Scott. He has met with success in the practice of his profession, and enjoys a good practice.

Our subject was married, in 1894, to Miss Helen

J. Shaw, a native of Michigan. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Scott, as follows: Wallace W. and Agnes C. Mr. Scott is a member of the Cass County Bar Association. He has been city attorney of Casselton for the past four years. He is a Republican in political faith, but does not seek public office.

HARVEY E. KEENE, who occupies an influential and prominent position among the agricultural population of Barnes county, makes his home on section 35, township 142, range 58 west, and is the owner of a fine farm, which he has placed under a high state of cultivation and improved with good buildings. His total acreage at the present time is nine hundred and sixty.

On a farm in Anoka county, Minnesota, Mr. Keene first opened his eyes to the light of day May 28, 1861, and when only two years old was taken by his parents, William H. and Florentine C. (Harvey) Keene, to a farm near Cottage Grove, Washington county, that state, where they still reside. The father is a native of Maine, and throughout life has followed farming. On the old homestead in Washington county, Minnesota, our subject grew to manhood, his time being devoted to the labors of leaving the parental roof in the spring of 1884 he came to Barnes county, North Dakota, where he worked for Page Persons for a time, and then operated rented land for two years. In the spring of 1887 he located on his present farm and has successfully engaged in its cultivation ever since.

In 1886 Mr. Keene married Miss Clara A. Swanson, who was born in Washington county, Minnesota, October 26, 1862, and they have become the parents of two children, namely: Vera V. and Orlo A. The Republican party finds in Mr. Keene a staunch supporter of its principles, but he has never cared for the honors or emoluments of public office, preferring to devote his entire time and attention to his business interests. Socially, he is a man of prominence in his community and a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

NELS P. NELSON, an industrious and enterprising business man and farmer residing in Devillo township, is one of the early settlers of Richland county. He located there in pioneer days and had but just taken up his residence in this country and knew little of American ways or language, but with a determination to succeed went on with his labors and has been well rewarded. He is now the possessor of one of the fine farms of that region and also operates a blacksmith shop in the village of Fairmount.

Mr. Nelson was born in Denmark, January 8, 1846. He followed the trade of a blacksmith in his native land until 1879, when he emigrated to America. In the spring of that year he settled on section 10, of Fairmount township, where he resided until 1884, when he removed to the village of Fairmount and engaged in blacksmithing, continuing until 1894. He then purchased the farm on which he now resides, on section 24, of Devillo township, and removed thereon in the spring of 1898. In connection with farming he also operates his shop in the village of Fairmount. His farm covers three hundred and twenty acres of land and substantial buildings and other improvements make it a pleasant home.

Our subject was married, in Denmark, March 23, 1869, to Miss Else K. Christenson. Mrs. Nelson was born in Denmark, April 18, 1844. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Nelson, as follows: Carrie, now Mrs. B. W. Schouweiler, a sketch of whom appears on another page of this volume; Mary, now Mrs. George Grosvenor; F. P.; Henry and Carl. Mr. Nelson is a prominent worker for the advancement of his community and has served as a member of the village board of Fairmount and is president of the Devillo township school board.

NELS R. PETERSON, proprietor of one of the fine farms of Riverside township, in Steele county, is a man of wide experience and has made a success of his vocation as a farmer. He is one of the very few Sheyenne river settlers and among the oldest of the pioneers of Steele county. He resides on section 32 and his possessions cover two hundred and eighty acres of land, one hundred and fifty acres of which are under cultivation, balance grass land. His farm was well chosen in the early day and is admirably adapted to diversified farming, in which he is engaged.

Our subject was born in Norway, October 26, 1847, and was the fifth in a family of six children born to Roald and Annie (Larson) Peterson, both of whom are deceased. His father was a carpenter by trade and as a boy our subject began working with his father and learned the trade and when twenty-four years of age he borrowed money and came to America in search of a fortune and a broader field for labor. He worked at farm work three years and then in a saw-mill in Wisconsin two years and then returned to Illinois, where he first resided, and after a short stay went to Iowa and engaged in farming in Clay county. He and two companions, Charles Palfrey and Samuel Lowe, in the spring of 1881, went to Dakota from Iowa overland. The high water and spring floods made traveling dangerous and in some places almost impossible and from Watson, Minnesota, to Fargo the trip was made by rail. After arriving at Steele county our subject selected his present farm and located thereon as a homestead. His companions took land farther from the valley on the wild prairie and after all had secured their land there was not ten dollars to be raised among them. Our subject has his team and wagon, but no other resources. They built a board shanty on Mr. Lowe's place and then all constructed a log house for our subject, consisting of oak logs, and was 18x20 feet. This forms the main part of Mr. Peterson's dwelling at present and is in a state of good preservation. Mr. Lowe later returned East and our subject and his other companion lived together and our subject worked on the railroad and on the Dalrymple farm and later was engaged in breaking land and during the season of 1882 raised a few acres of oats and then lived alone on his farm three years and increased his cultivated acreage each year. He devotes himself at present to diversified farming, his farm furnishing good timber shelter and hilly land and watered by flowing springs.

Our subject has a well-cultivated tract and enjoys prosperity.

Mr. Peterson was married, in 1884, to Miss Isabelle Johnson. Mr. and Mrs. Peterson have been the parents of one son, Robert, now deceased. Mr. Peterson is a member of the Lutheran church and is a gentleman who is held in the highest esteem by his fellow men. Politically, he is a Republican.

HENRY GRONKE, living in Hillsboro, retired from active labors, went to the Goose river country in Dakota, in 1871, settling on a farm there June 2, and in company with Charles Mergenthal, became the earliest pioneer of the county. Mr. Mergenthal had been through the country the previous year with a surveying party and he and our subject are known as the founders of the German settlement of Eldorado township, Traill county. Mr. Gronke experienced many hardships in his pioneer home, but is now enjoying the reward of his industry and persistent efforts and has a comfortable home in Hillsboro.

Our subject was born in Hanover, Germany, June 4, 1846, and was the second child and only son of a family of three children born to Henry and Catherine (Bausa) Gronke. He came to America in 1857 with his parents and joined his sister in Illinois and as he was a tailor by trade followed that line. His father soon afterward left Illinois for Yankton, Dakota territory, and there he died in 1870 and the following spring our subject joined his mother at Yankton, but was not pleased with the prospects presented in that part of the state and as his brother-in-law, Mr. Mergenthal, had recently returned from a trip through the Red river valley and reported favorably regarding the country, five families started on May 24 for the Goose river country. They all drove ox-teams and arrived at their destination June 2 and our subject took a pre-emption claim in section 34, in township 46, range 50, and Mr. Mergenthal settled near by, but the others of the party after a few days left for Minnesota. The little group of log buildings erected by our subject and his party were the only marks of civilization for miles around and all was undisturbed throughout the valley. Thirty years have passed since then and the most vivid imagination could not picture the advancement of that wilderness. They were undecided which to pursue, the raising of wheat or cattle, the tall grass and luxurious feed pointing to the latter industry, while the excellence of the soil and the severe winters decided for the former and they bent their efforts to wheat raising, which was very unsatisfactory until 1874 on account of grasshoppers. The potato crop was to be depended on and the establishment of a store on the Red river by the Hudson's Bay Company made a ready market for their produce. The crop of 1874 was a success and to the present advancement has been sure and rapid. Our subject now owns seven hundred and sixty acres of land and on his home farm has a large barn and comfortable residence, in which his only son now resides and rents the farm. Mr. Gronke has made his home in Hillsboro since 1898.

Our subject was married, in 1872, to Miss Amelia Housemann. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Gronke, as follows: Ida, now Mrs. D. Engle; William, residing on the home farm, and Minnie, who resides with her parents. Mr. Gronke is a member of the German Lutheran church and in political sentiment is a Republican.

GEORGE LIPPETT. Among the sons of the German empire, in whose coming to America all who honor honest industry may well rejoice, the gentleman whose name introduces this review is entitled to prominent mention. He went to his present location in township 139, range 65, in the early days of the settlement of that locality and has risen to a prominent position as an agriculturist and public-spirited citizen entirely by his own efforts and he is now one of the extensive land-owners of that vicinity and has one of the best improved estates in Stutsman county.

Our subject was born in Germany, in 1854, and was a son of Chris Lippert, who was a farmer by occupation as was also the grandfather of our subject, Martin Lippert. His maternal grandfather, Florentine Lampuan, was a machinist and manufacturer. George Lippert was raised on a farm and received a country-school education, after which he remained in his native land engaged in farming with his father until 1881, when he came to America. He learned the stone mason's trade in Germany, but after coming to America settled in Jefferson, Wisconsin, where he worked at farm labor until the fall of 1883, when he went to North Dakota and purchased the north half of section 35, in township 139, range 65. He worked out the first two years in Dakota and he and his wife conducted the farm which he afterward purchased. He was foreman on a farm of five hundred and twenty acres and had two men working under him on the place. He now owns a farm of eight hundred and forty acres, of which he has five hundred acres under cultivation. He has erected a complete set of substantial buildings, including a commodious and convenient residence, built in two parts, and one of the largest and most substantial barns in that locality. His crops are always to be relied upon and he has made a success of his vocation in Dakota.

Our subject was married, in 1881, to Miss Susan Seitel, who was a native of Germany, and was a playmate of Mr. Lippert. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lippert, as follows: Lizzie, Henry, George, Richard, Annie, August and Edward. Our subject takes an active interest in affairs of a public nature and has held numerous local offices and served as a school officer. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Lutheran church. In political sentiment he is a Democrat.

NICHOLAS SCHULTHEIS, an extensive land-owner residing on section 30, of Devillo township, Richland county, is one of the early settlers of that region and has amassed his fortune by dint of good management and persistent efforts. He is one of the influential men of his community and is active in his work for the development of that region.

Mr. Schultheis was born in Germany, December 23, 1859, and was one of a family of six children, three sons and three daughters, born to George and Margaret (Dressel) Schultheis. The father died in Germany in 1865 and the mother emigrated to America with her family. They settled at Minneapolis, Minnesota, where our subject grew to manhood. He was educated in the public schools of that city and afterwards was employed for many years in the planing-mill there. He went to Dakota territory in the fall of 1879 and entered a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 18, in Devillo township, Richland county, where he resided until the fall of 1895, when he settled on his present farm. He removed to the town of Hankinson in the spring of 1897 and was employed as wheat buyer for Cargill & Company and was in their employ until the spring of 1899, when he returned to his farm on section 30, in Devillo township. His farm is equipped with modern buildings and machinery and is one of the best in the township. His buildings were erected in 1895 and are commodious and substantial structures. He is the owner of nine hundred and sixty acres of land and valuable property in the town of Hankinson.

Our subject was married, in Minneapolis, Minnesota, January 11, 1880, to Miss Mary Gemmett, who was born in Dubuque, Iowa, December 18, 1863. Mrs. Schultheis was a daughter of Anton and Fredericka (Kohl) Gemmett, the former a native of Italy and the latter of Germany. Her parents were married in Dubuque, Iowa, and the mother died there in 1892. Mrs. Schultheis was the only daughter in a family of three children. Mr. and Mrs. Schultheis have been the parents of three children, two of whom are living, namely: Anna M., now Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, and Peter L. One son, Anthony, died in Hankinson, aged eleven years. Our subject is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. He has served as school director for several years and is an earnest worker for educational advancement.

JOHN G. JOHNS, M. D., one of the early settlers of Wells county, was successfully engaged in mercantile pursuits for many years and is well known throughout that locality. He has built up an extensive practice in his profession, and is one of the rising young physicians of the county. He established his office in Cathay comparatively few years ago, but is recognized as a skillful practitioner and is remarkably successful. A portrait of Dr. Johns appears on another page.

Our subject was born in LaFayette county, Wisconsin, October 10, 1865. His father, James Johns, was born in England and came to America in 1860 and became a pioneer of Wisconsin and is now proprietor of a large farm in LaFayette county. The mother of our subject, who bore the maiden name of Belinda Orchard, was born in England and her ancestors were in the wars between France and England and our subject has relics of those wars.

Dr. Johns is the fourth in a family of eight children and was raised on the farm. He attended the country school and the State Normal at Platteville, Wisconsin, and in 1886 took a course in the Physicians & Surgeons School in Chicago, and the following year went to South Dakota and settled at Ashton, Spink county, where he purchased grain for the D. R. Putnam Elevator Company two years and in 1888 went to Eureka and erected an elevator and bought grain two years. He went to North Dakota in 1890 and became associated with the James Johns Elevator Company. They owned a line of elevators on the Northern Pacific Railroad and the same year our subject went to Sykeston and operated the elevator there for the company. He filed claim to land near Fessenden in 1892 and also built an elevator at Fessenden and unloaded the first car load of lumber in the town. He also built the first livery barn in Fessenden and in 1895 disposed of the barn and also his interest in the elevator and went to Nashville, Tennessee, where he attended the medical department of the University of Nashville, graduating with the highest honors in March, 1897, with the degree of M. D. He located at Moline, Illinois, the same year and practiced his profession there one year and in 1898 located at Cathay, North Dakota, where he established his practice and also started a small drug store.

Our subject was married, June 28, 1892, to Miss Estella Karr. Mrs. Johns was born and raised in Ripon, Wisconsin. Her father, James Karr, is of Canadian-Irish descent and is a carriagemaker by trade and an inventor of distinction in the line of carriage manufacture. Her mother, Elizabeth (Rowbotham) Karr, was of English descent. Mrs. Johns' grandfather, Rev. William Rowbotham, was born in England. Has been a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church for more than a half-century and is now superannuated from the east Wisconsin conference. He reform principles in political views and is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and Ancient Order of United Workmen. He was among the first business men of Wells county and is well known by his friends as "Chief Justice Johns."

John G. John M. 10.

HORACE P. BOGUE. The man who was content to go through the Civil war as a "high" private, doing his duty nobly and unflinchingly on the field of battle or in camp, is the man who to-day is serving to the best of his ability—and that ability is of a superior order—as sheriff of Burleigh county, North Dakota, making his home in Bismarck, where he located in pioneer days.

Mr. Bogue is a native of Illinois, his birth occurring in Ogle county, October 7, 1843. His parents, Virgil and Catherine (Nichols) Bogue, were natives of New York and Canada, respectively. The father, who was a lawyer by profession, located in Ogle county, Illinois, about 1831, or 1832, and became one of its most prominent and influential citizens, serving as county judge for seventeen years. He also entered land there and improved a farm. He died in Ogle county, in December, 1868, and his wife passed away in 1867. In their family were seven children, two sons and five daughters.

In the county of his nativity our subject grew to manhood and was educated. He joined the boys in blue during the Rebellion. In March, 1862, enlisting in Company A, Sixty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He was captured at Harper's Ferry, but was at once paroled and participated in the battle of Kenesaw Mountain, the siege of Atlanta, the battles of Franklin and Nashville, Tennessee, and Fort Fisher and Goldsboro, North Carolina. Fortunately he escaped without wounds and after three years and six months of arduous service was honorably discharged.

Returning to his home in Ogle county, Illinois, he engaged in farming there for one year and then went to Ashland, Nebraska, where he broke prairie for some time. From there he moved to Merryville, Kansas, and in 1872 came to Bismarck, North Dakota, in company with Dr. Burleigh, who was then engaged in building the Northern Pacific Railroad into this place. After working for the railroad company for two months he entered land near Bismarck in 1874. For four years he engaged in clerking here in a grocery house and then opened a general store of his own, which he successfully conducted until 1890, when appointed postmaster of Bismarck, filling that office for three years and a half. He was elected county assessor in 1878 and in 1898 was elected sheriff, which office he is now filling in a most creditable and acceptable manner. While serving in that capacity he hung the second man executed in the state and the first in Burleigh county. He has always affiliated with the Republican party and is a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Grand Army of the Republic. He has met with well-deserved success since coming to this state and as one of the representative citizens and honored pioneers of Bismarck is certainly deserving of prominent mention in its history.

In 1876 Mr. Bogue married Miss Catherine Elliott, a native of Canada, and to them have been born two children: Gilbert F and Mary E.

After having worked as a farmer and sailor until his twenty-second year he came to America and worked in a saw-mill in Wisconsin, and spent the winters in the lumber woods. He worked on a grading train for about two years and during several threshing seasons followed that work in Goodhue county, Minnesota. He had about two hundred and fifty dollars with which to develop his farm and built a log house 12x16 feet. SAMUEL B. LANGFORD. As a representative farmer and exemplary citizen of Sverdrup township, this gentleman is deserving of special mention. He is one of the earliest settlers of Griggs county and from a limited start he has gained a fine estate, and on section 6 enjoys the comfort of one of the finest residences of the county. Mr. Langford was born in Cornwall, England, January 8, 1837, and was a son of Samuel and Mary Langford, both natives of England. The father died many years ago and the aged mother survives him and makes her home in Cornwall, England.

Our subject remained in his native land and attended school and also assisted on the farm until he had attained his majority, when he came to America and located at Ontario, Canada. He engaged in the pursuit of farming there until 1872, when he removed to St. Clair county, Michigan, where he also followed farming and resided until 1881, when he went to Griggs county, North Dakota. He erected a shanty on his land, near the site of his present residence, and the little shanty was among the first built in the neighborhood. He has steadily improved the property and has gathered about him all the conveniences and comforts of modern farming. His buildings are substantial structures and every arrangement has been supplied with an idea to the economical conduct of the farm and the comfort of its inhabitants.

Mr. Langford was married in Canada, in 1859, to Mary Brown, a native of England. Mrs. Langford died about four years after their marriage, leaving two children, Samuel and Bessie. Mr. Langford married Miss Hannah Lewis, a native of England, in 1865. Nine children have been born to this union, as follows: Laura M., Alberta A., Oliver A., John H., Alfred E., Lillian M., Ida E., who died in infancy, Cora and Minnie. Mr. Langford is prominent in local affairs of a public nature and is justice of the peace. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Methodist Episcopal church and is a trustee and steward of that denomination. In political sentiment he is a Populist. He is a man of broad ideas and keeps abreast of the times and is highly esteemed throughout the county.

HON. FRANK J. LANGER, cashier of the First National Bank of Casselton, is a gentleman of rare ability and the intricate affairs of the institution with which he is connected are successfully attended to by him. He has been identified with the development and advancement of the social and financial interests of Cass county for nearly a quarter of a century and has always had the welfare of his adopted country uppermost in his mind. He has gained a high position and is worthy the confidence reposed in him.

Our subject was born near Prague, Germany, August 22, 1849, and was a son of Franz and Rosa (Miller) Langer, both natives of Germany. The family came to America in 1852 and located at Watertown, Wisconsin, and later moved to Plainview, Minnesota, where the mother died and the father still resides. Three sons and one daughter were born to this worthy couple, two of whom are now in Cass county, North Dakota.

Our subject was reared and educated in Wisconsin and Minnesota and followed farming in the last named state until 1877, when he went to Cass county, North Dakota, and entered claim to land near Casselton, which he improved and he now owns and operates four sections of land in that vicinity. He became a director in the First National Bank of Casselton in 1894, and was elected to the position of cashier about the same time and is now ably filling the same.

Our subject was married, in 1874, to Miss Mary Webber, a native of Germany. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Langer. Mr. Langer was elected to the legislature in 1890 and served one term in the lower house and was efficient in his work for the interest of his constituents. He was elected county commissioner of Cass county in 1892 and served six years and has also filled many minor offices, including town clerk and chairman of the town board. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and has been a member of the Masonic order for many years. ANDREW ANDERBERG, an industrious and thorough farmer, who is now successfully following his chosen calling on section 14, township 141, range 58 west, Barnes county, North Dakota, was born on a farm in Sweden, February 17, 1848, and is a son of P. and Hannah (Hanson) Anderberg, also natives of that country, where the father died when our subject was only eight years old. The son continued to live with his mother in his native land until 1869, when he sailed for the New World and became a resident of Washington county, Minnesota. He worked in sawmills and upon farms in that county until 1878, which year witnessed his arrival in Barnes county, before the county was organized and when Dakota was still a territory. Here he has labored untiringly to make for himself and family a home and prosperity has crowned his well-directed efforts, for he is now the owner of three hundred and twenty acres of as fine farming land as is to be found in the county.

In 1879 Mr. Anderberg led to the marriage altar Miss Hannah Piculell, of Washington county, Minnesota, who was born in Sweden in 1853. Politically, Mr. Anderberg is identified with the Republican party. In 1879 he was elected school treasurer of district No. 6, and has served as such continuously since to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. His upright, honorable life commends him to the confidence of all and he is justly deserving the high regard in which he is uniformly held.

JOHN W. LARAMORE, an enterprising agriculturist of Melrose township, in Steele county, furnishes a striking example of the results of well-directed labor and persistent efforts. He has met with many discouragements in his Dakota home, but despite these has risen to prominence as a wide-awake and progressive farmer and loyal citizen. He has a fine residence recently constructed on section 34 and has gathered about him the comforts and conveniences of a model farm.

Our subject was born near Frederica, Delaware, November 22, 1852, and was the seventh in a family of fourteen children born to John and Dorcas (Wyatt) Laramore. The family removed from the state of Delaware when our subject was five years of age and settled on a farm near Bradford, Stark county, Illinois. When eighteen years of age our subject left the home farm and worked on the railroad as bridge carpenter for two years and in the fall of 1872 went to Minnesota and worked at teaming in Rice county. He spent the winter of 1873 in Missouri and the following season engaged in farming in Iowa and the second season farmed in Missouri. He removed further north on account of sickness in his family and later went to Utah, returning to Iowa in 1877 and remained in Marshall county until 1881, when he went to Fari-bault, Minnesota, and in the spring of 1883 went to Wahpeton, Dakota, and broke land for the incoming settlers. He worked the following winter in the Minnesota woods and in the spring of 1884 shipped teams to Wheatland and arrived at Hope April to with a wagon load of household goods, a team and five dollars in money. His wife soon joined him and they lived in the wagon until a 10x12-foot house was built, he mortgaged his team to secure the lumber. He has since purchased additional land and is now the owner of one and a half sections. Lightning destroyed his barn and a fine running horse in 1893, entailing a loss of three thousand dollars, and in 1899 his pioneer house was burned and he has since erected one of the best farmhouses in the township and has placed other valuable improvements on the place.

Our subject was married, in 1873, to Miss Celine Owen, a native of Minnesota. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Laramore, as follows: Mamie, now Mrs. Klovstad, of Hope, North Dakota; Walter and Maude. Mr. Laramore is a member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he has

He continued to reside there until 1883, when he went to North Dakota and made his home with his sister in Devillo township. He has since been a continuous resident of that township. Two years after going to Dakota he rented the farm whereon he now resides, on section 34, and now operates five hundred acres of land. He has followed the pursuit of agriculture throughout his career and is one of the successful men of that vocation in Richland county.

Our subject was married, in December, 1885, to Miss Addie C. Olds, a daughter of Andrew J. Olds, of De Villo township. Mrs. Thompson was born in the same county in Michigan in which her husband was born. Three children have blessed the home of Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, named as follows: Lulu M., Lillian A. and Bertha I. Mr. Thompson is a member of the Masonic fraternity and the Modern Woodmen of America. He is prominent in public affairs of local importance and has served as township clerk. He is a young man of industrious and careful habits and is held in the highest esteem by his associates.

ROBERT B. BLAKEMORE, one of Fargo's most energetic and progressive citizens, who is now successfully engaged in the insurance and real estate business, is a native of Kentucky, born in Christian county, on the 14th of September, 1866. His parents, George B. and Clara (Gist) Blakemore, were natives of Virginia and Maryland, respectively. The father was a captain in the Confederate army during the Civil war and was in General Johnston's command. He participated in the battles of Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain and the engagements of the Atlanta campaign. In early life the father engaged in merchandising and later was interested in the tobacco and cotton trade in New Orleans. He died in Louisiana in 1868, and his wife departed this life two years later, leaving our subject, their only child, all alone in the world at the age of four years.

Mr. Blakemore was educated in the schools of Kentucky and Maryland, attending first the military school at Hopkinsville, Kentucky, and later St.

ROBERT B. BLAKEMORE.

John's College, of Annapolis, Maryland. In 1883 he came to Fargo, North Dakota, and was employed as bookkeeper by a hardware firm for two years. Dickon in 1885, and three years later succeeded to the business, which he has since carried on, meeting with marked success in the undertaking. He has also engaged in farming to a considerable extent.

In 1888 Mr. Blakemore was united in marriage with Miss Clara C. Taylor, a native of Maryland, who now resides with gracious dignity over their pleasant home in Fargo. Mr. Blakemore takes no active part in political affairs and has never filled public office, desiring rather to give his entire time and attention to his business interests. He is a Jeffersonian Democrat and is all that title implies. He is, however, very popular among his fellow citizens and is an honored member of the Masonic fraternity, the Knights of Pythias, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Ancient Order of United Workmen and B. P. O. E. A portrait of Mr. Blakemore is presented on another page.

OLE A. HONG. The story of the wonderful resources of America, of the opportunities afforded honest industry to gain a footing in business and society, has attracted many natives of the Scandinavian peninsula. They are found wielding the implements of the trades, opening up unsettled regions and bringing the country into high cultivation. Traill county, North Dakota, is not without her share of these men and prominent among this class is the subject of this review. Mr. Hong is a leading business man of Buxton and is a hardware and furniture dealer of that thriving village and one of its oldest settlers.

Our subject was born in Guldbrandsdalen, Norway, March 8, 1861, and was the eldest of thirteen children born to Amund and Marie (Stalsberg) Hong, both of whom reside on the estate Hong, in Norway, where our subject was born. The family tree traces back hundreds of years and some of the early records are preserved on sheepskin.

At the age of fourteen years Mr. Hong began learning the tinsmith's trade and followed it in the city of Hammar until twenty years of age and then crossed the ocean to seek his fortunes in the New World. He came alone to verify the reports of this country and the wonderful fertility of the Red river valley and finding a good business opening he established a hardware and furniture store at Buxton in 1887 and became one of the earliest residents of the village and has been identified with the up-building of the same. He enjoys liberal patronage and is well known.

Our subject was married, in 1881, to Miss Gurene Larson, a native of Norway. Mr. and Mrs. Hong have one adopted daughter, Agnes. Mr. Hong was deputy sheriff of Traill county four years and is one of the leading Republicans in the northeastern part of the county. He attends county and state conventions and takes an active part in public affairs. He is a member of the Lutheran church and is deservedly held in high esteem by all with whom he comes in contact.

MARTIN E. LARSON. As a successful farmer, who is carefully tilling the soil of Sheridan township, La Moure county, and gaining for himself a competence sufficient to tide him through future years and incidentally gaining an enviable reputation, this gentleman is worthy prominent mention. He resides on section 32 and is well known throughout his locality. His early life in Dakota was beset with the usual trials of a pioneer, but he has surmounted the difficulties as they were presented and is now among the substantial men of that region.

Our subject was born on a farm in Green county, Wisconsin, November 19, 1860, and was the fifth in a family of eleven children, seven sons and four daughters, born to Erick and Amanda (Evans) Larson. His father was one of the early settlers of Wisconsin, coming to America from his native country, Norway. He went to California during the Civil war and while there on a prospecting tour became ill and returned home, from which illness he died in 1877, in which year our subject's mother also passed away.

Martin Larson attended the district school and assisted on the farm until 1882, when he went to La Moure county, North Dakota, and located land on which he settled the following spring. He and his brother, C. E. Larson, lived alone on the farm until 1888, when they dissolved partnership and each began farming for himself. He is now the fortunate possessor of three hundred and twenty acres of land on which he conducts general farming and has met with success.

Mr. Larson was married, in Jamestown, North Dakota, January 24, 1889, to Miss Sarah E. Fryar, a native of Wabasha county, Minnesota. Mrs. Larson was the youngest in a family of ten children, four sons and six daughters, born to Thomas and Minerva (Phelps) Fryar and her birth is dated December 28, 1868. Her father was a native of England and came to America when eleven years of age and was married in the Empire state. He was a carriagemaker by trade. Mr. and Mrs. Larson are the parents of four children, as follows: Mary, Grace, Alice and Francis. Mr. Larson is a Republican in political faith, but does not take an active part in public affairs, devoting his attention strictly to his farm work and the development of that locality is due in a great measure to the efforts of such wide-awake and industrious citizens.

MAT MATSON is one of the representative business men of Eddy county and conducts the grain commission business at New Rockford, and is also engaged in general farming and is owner of extensive lands in that vicinity. He is a successful business man and influential citizen and highly esteemed.

He was raised on a farm in his native land and received a common and high-school education, and at the age of nineteen years came to America and located at Red Wing, Minnesota. He was there employed in a clothing store as salesman three years, and in 1882 went to St. Paul, Minnesota, and was employed as clothing salesman six years in the United States Clothing House. He went from St. Paul to North Dakota, in 1888, and was engaged in clerking in the clothing house of Hohl & Hanson one year, and in the fall of 1889 entered into partnership with D. Niven in the general merchandise business, under the firm name of Niven & Mattson, and conducted the business successfully till the spring of 1899, when Dowkes & Woodward became proprietors of the business. #### DR. WILLIAM C. SHURLOCK.

"Optima mors parca quae venit apta die."

Propertius.

DR. WILLIAM C. SHURLOCK (deceased) was born at Enon Valley, Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, on January 6, 1835. Died at Fargo, North Dakota, January 17, 1892. Attended Darlington Academy for a number of years, also Beaver Academy, Beaver county, Pennsylvania; taught school in Darlington township for two or three years; studied medicine with Dr. W. S. Cochrane, of Darlington, Pennsylvania, and attended lectures at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia; graduated from there in the year 1858. The same year commenced the practice of medicine in Darlington, Pennsylvania; continued there for sixteen years. Then moved to Beaver Falls, remained there for six years. Came to Fargo, North Dakota, in October, 1880.

He was enrolled and mustered into the service of the United States army for three years during the war, at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, on the 31st day of August, 1861, as captain of Company D, "Roundheads," or One Hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers, commanded by Colonel Daniel Leaseure. On the 28th of December, 1863, he was commissioned surgeon with the rank of major of Pennsylvania Volunteers; served as surgeon of the Fifty-First Pennsylvania Volunteers until the close of the war, was honorably discharged on the 6th day of June, 1865, at Alexandria, Virginia. Was a member of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania in 1870, 1871, 1872 and 1873; was chief clerk of the house in 1874, 1877, 1878 and 1879.

He was a graduate of the class of 1858 of the Jefferson Medical College, of Philadelphia. He then returned to Darlington, Beaver county, Pennsylvania, and entered upon the practice of his profession. There he stayed until the echo of the first gun fired at Fort Sumter reverberated through Beaver county. He then thought it his duty to offer his services to his country. He raised a company of one hundred and ten men for the three-months service, but they were not accepted as the state's quota was filled. He kept his company together and when the time arrived he entered the service as captain of Company D, of the "Roundheads," or One Hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers. He was in the taking of Port Royal and Beaufort, South Carolina, after which he was stricken down with disease with no prospect of recovering his health in that climate. On the recommendations of the surgeons of his regiment he was induced to resign on the 16th day of December, 1861. He went home and the change restored him to health and he again entered the service as assistant surgeon in the One Hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers; his commission dated July 15, 1862. He served with his regiment until December 28, 1863, when he was promoted to surgeon and ordered to report for duty to the Fifty-First Pennsylvania Veteran Volunteers on the 9th day of March, 1864, and remained on duty as surgeon at the division hospital in the field, where he remained on duty until April 24, 1865, when he returned to his regiment and remained with it till June 6, 1865, when he was mustered out of service under orders of the war department for the reduction of the army, dated May 17, 1865.

Battles in which he participated were Port Royal, second Bull Run, Chantilly, South Mountain, Antietam, Fredricksburg, Vicksburg, Jackson, Blue Springs, Campbell's Station, siege of Knoxville, Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House, Cold Harbor, North Anna, front of Petersburg, June 17th and 18th, Burnside's Mine, Weldin Railroad, Ream's Station, Poplar Grove, Church, Hatchie's Run, Fort Steadman, capture of Petersburg and fall of Richmond.

Brother Shurlock was a charter member of Fargo, now Auvergne, Commandery, and was a member thereof at the time of his death. He was also a member of El Zagal Temple, A. A. O. Brother Shurlock was a man large physically, embonpoint, and equally large mentally. He possessed a wonderful fund of war reminiscences which he related in such an inimitable manner that he at once interested the most indifferent. He thoroughly believed in the German proverb, "Leben und lassen." Of the good things of life he had a peculiar appreciation and exemplified the ulterior meaning of the Egyptian saying, "Eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die." He possessed the faculty of drawing men to him and enkindling in their hearts friendships that endure a lifetime.

He was eminently successful as a physician and his great skill in surgery was recognized and appreciated by his co-laborers in that professional field. At the time of his death he was president of the State Medical Association. His strong individuality, his genial qualities, his scholarly habits of thought impressed his associates and won their admiration and respect. He was a man amongst men, with faults and foibles that distinguished men from angels. These die with the body. Virtues, like the soul, live on, and by these we measure the man. "Virtue alone outbuilds the Pyramids;

Her monuments shall last when Egypt falls."

The niche which he occupied in life, there is no one to fill. Common men die and their places are filled as the water rushes in to replace the drop that is taken away. Not with those strong individualized souls, moulded either in clay, granite or that between; when death blasts them from earth the place they occupied still remains hollowed out in earth's life history. The soldier, the citizen, the physician has started on his pilgrimage with but the efforts of an earthly existence in his scrip to maintain him. May his good deeds follow him and all else be left behind.

JAMES K. JOSLYN. The vast agricultural interests of Steele county, North Dakota, have been enhanced in a marked measure by the labors of such citizens and farmers as the above named gentleman. He is one of the progressive and enlightened men of Melrose township and his pleasant home on section 35 is evidence of his good taste and his entire estate evidences good management. He is the owner of seven quarter-sections of land and every appointment of his home farm is of the most approved and modern style.

Our subject was born in Orleans county, Vermont, November 30, 1847, and was the sixth in a family of seven children born to Peter A. and Alice (Sartwell) Joslyn. His parents were both born in 1808, and the father lived to the age of eighty-three years and the mother died at the advanced age of ninety years. His father was a mason and plasterer by trade.

Our subject began farming when a boy and at the age of seventeen years began working for others and devoted his earnings to the completion of his education. After attaining his majority he taught one term of school and then accepted a position as fireman on the C. & P. R. R., which he held two years, and when twenty-three years of age became engineer and ran freight and passenger engines for nine years. He then decided to turn his attention to farming and accordingly went to Hope, North Dakota, in the spring of 1883, and feeling confident of success in that region invested in six hundred and forty acres of land within a mile of the village of Hope, in Steele county. He rented out his land the first season and in 1884 lived thereon alone and followed farming, and also began the improvements, which, as circumstances permitted, he enlarged upon. He had not the means with which to pay in full for his land, and he is now the owner of an extensive tract, which he has fully improved. His residence, completed in 1887, is probably one of the best farm houses in the county and is a modern structure and furnishes every convenience and comfort. He built a commodious barn in 1892 and during the past year has erected a twelve-thousand-bushel-capacity elevator in which to conveniently store his grain to take advantage of the market. He has taken great care in the selection of grain for seed, and does an extensive business in furnishing the same to his neighbors.

Our subject was married, in 1885, to Miss Cora Rugg. Three children were born to this union, as follows: Howard, deceased; Ethel and Edna, the last two named being twins. Mrs. Joslyn died in 1893. Mr. Joslyn was married to Miss Augusta Gray in 1895. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Joslyn, as follows: Alice, Everett and Claude. Our subject is prominent in public affairs of local importance, and is chairman of the township board, and has been a member of that body since the organization of the township. He is a supporter of the Congregational church, and is a man of exemplary character. Politically he is a Republican, and is a strong advocate of prohibition. He is a man who studies the questions of the day, and will always be found standing for justice and right, and is a man highly esteemed throughout the locality.

CHARLES EDWIN NEWBY. The pioneer settlers of a country are the ones who mold her destiny, and to those who went to Richland county in the early days of her history much credit is due for the present solid prosperity of that region. Among those who labored for the upbuilding of that county the gentleman above named should be accorded a foremost place. He has improved his estate and added to his possessions, and is now one of the prosperous and enterprising farmers of Fairmount township, wherein his land is located, and he makes his home on section 7.

Our subject was born on a farm in Portage county, Wisconsin, October 25, 1855, and was the fifth in a family of eight children born to John and Delilah (Uphagrove) Newby. His father was an early settler of Wisconsin, and on his farm our subject was reared, receiving a common school education. He remained in his native county until he went to North Dakota in the spring of 1879, when he entered a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land in section 7, Fairmount township. He has improved the property and is now the owner of one half-section of land, on which he has gathered about him all the comforts of modern farming.

Our subject was married in Portage county, Wisconsin, March 15, 1883, to Miss Hattie L. Rood, who was born in Portage, Wisconsin, March 29, 1862. Mrs. Newby was the second in a family of three children born to Harlow S. and Malinda (Cook) Rood. Mr. and Mrs. Newby are the parents of three children, as follows: Clay C., Ruby I. and Wesley H. The family are attendants of the Methodist Episcopal church, and both Mr. and Mrs. Newby are members of the same, and take an active part in religious affairs. Our subject is prominent in matters of a public nature, and has served his township as treasurer, supervisor and constable. He has gained the confidence of the members of his community, and is well known throughout Richland county as a public spirited and energetic citizen.

SYLVAN E. BAYLEY belongs to that large class of intelligent and enterprising farmers whose work as a developer of the country is a credit to themselves and the community. His estate is located in Cornell township, Cass county, and he enjoys the comforts of a model country home.

Our subject was born in Dodge county, Wisconsin, September 23, 1847, and was a son of Benjamin and Hannah (Horr) Bayley, both of whom were natives of Vermont. His father was a shoemaker by trade, and later in life followed farming. He moved to Dodge county, Wisconsin, about 1840, and the father died there in 1876, and the mother also passed away in that state. Seven sons and three daughters were born to them, our subject being the only one in North Dakota.

Mr. Bayley was reared in Wisconsin, and received his education there, and continued his residence in Dodge county until he went to Cass county, North Dakota, locating his land there in 1879, and his residence thereon dates from the following spring. He entered claim to land in section 24 of Cornell township, as a homestead, and was the first settler in that part of the township. He now operates about one section of land, and is among the substantial men of his township.

Our subject was married in Dodge county, Wisconsin, February 22, 1870, to Melissa A. Sanford, a native of that state. To Mr. and Mrs. Bayley have been born five children, named as follows: Frank W., Arthur L., Edith I., Cora S. and Ray E., all of whom are living. Mr. Bayley was active in the organization of his township, and has served as assessor continuously since that time. Politically he is a Republican, and is a man who keeps pace with the times.

GEORGE F. SCHLOSSER, of whom a portrait is shown in connection with this sketch, is one of the best known and most highly esteemed citizens of Traill county. He was an early settler of North Dakota, and has resided near Mayville for the past ten years, during which time he has gained his commendable position as a man of excellent character and active public spirit. His farm is one of the most extensive in the state and is fully improved, and on account of its location, affording the quiet of country life and the educational and social advantages of the city, is one of the finest pieces of property to be found.

Our subject is a native of Brownsdale, Minnesota, and was born December 19, 1858, and was the youngest of a family of four children born to Albert and Katherina (Nies) Schlosser, both of whom were of German descent. The mother died when our subject was a child and the father is residing with his daughter in Iowa. The father married a second and a third time, and two children were born to these later unions, the family numbering in all six children. The family settled in Columbia county, Wisconsin, where our subject resided amid pleasant surroundings until he attained his majority. With twenty dollars cash, he started, in company with his brother and Mr. P. Kehler, in a prairie schooner, in 1880, for Dakota and arrived in Grand Forks county. He at once sought work, and June 9 began on the Grandin farm, in Traill county, and there did his first wage earning. He soon saw the possibilities in Dakota, and took land as a pre-emption in Grand Forks county, and there built a shanty and purchased on time a yoke of oxen and began to turn the sod. Ninety acres was the result of his first season's work for himself and others, and he soon began the cultivation of his land. He secured an additional one hundred and sixty acres and pushed forward the improvements of his farm, and in 1889 sold advantageously and at once invested in three hundred and twenty acres on the Goose river, adjoining the city of Mayville, where he has since resided. This proved a good investment, as it has since more than doubled in value. His farm comprises timber land, some of which has been sold to the city and has been converted into a beautiful island park, which in summer presents a lively scene of picnics, boating and swimming. Mr. Schlosser has recently donated to the city a location for the electric light plant. For the comfort and convenience of the family, he erected a handsome residence in 1898, which is fitted with modern heating and sewage systems, and is a model in every particular, while the furnishings evidence the good taste of its occupants. He has added to his original purchase of land, and now owns three thousand and one hundred and sixty acres of land in Traill and Steele counties, all of which he personally supervises.

Our subject was married, in 1888, to Miss Lizzie McMillin. Six children have been born to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Schlosser, as follows: George,

GEORGE F. SCHLOSSER.

Pearl, Anna May, Glenn, Gladys and Francis W. Mr. Schlosser was elected mayor of the city of Mayville in 1898, re-elected in 1899, and under his guidance many improvements have been established. A relentless war has been waged on gambling games and games of chance and liquor dealers, an electric-light plant has been established and a water-works system has been begun. A public library building will soon be opened, owing to the generous donation of J. L. and E. B. Grandin and the support of the citizens of Mayville.

FRANK P. DEBOLT is successfully pursuing farming and stock raising on one of the pleasant farms of township 146, range 65, in Foster county, and makes his home in section 30. His skillful management of his affairs, and his practical nature have been potent factors in his success and in assisting to produce the present solid prosperity of that locality, and it is with pleasure that a review of his career is presented in this volume.

Our subject was born in Hamilton county, Ohio, January 27, 1855. His father, Mikel DeBolt, was a farmer and stock keeper in Newtown, Ohio, east of Cincinnati, and was of German descent. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of Martha Martin, and was of Welsh descent.

Mr. DeBolt is the youngest in a family of twelve children, and was raised in the village of Newtown, and attended the public schools there, after which he took a course in St. Averages College in Cincinnati, and then attended the normal school at Lebanon. His eyes failed as he began the study of the languages, and he was forced to give up his studies after four years spent in college life. He began clerking in his father's store, and at the age of twenty-one left home and clerked a few years in Indianapolis, Indiana, when he and two brothers established a grocery and feed business in that city. After eighteen months our subject disposed of his interest and went to Chicago, Illinois, and there clerked in a furniture store, then went to St. Joe, Michigan, and bought and sold fruit as a speculation. He returned later to Newtown, and then went again to Indianapolis in 1882, and was in the commission business in that city three years, handling vegetables, fruit and farm products. He came to Foster county, North Dakota, in 1885, and entered claim to the northeast quarter of section 34, in township 146, range 65, as a homestead, and erected a claim sod shanty 12x12 feet, and moved his family to the new home. He dug a well, but had no other improvements and no teams for farming the land, and the first summer only filled the requirements of the law as regards improvements. In the fall of that year he worked in the harvest field, the first farm labor he ever did. He had gone to Dakota from the city and an active business life, and the first summer in his new home was filled with pleasures of outdoor life. He engaged in clerking in Fargo during the winter of 1885-86, and the following spring bought a team, wagon and cow, and the first season cropped seven acres of oats which were never threshed. His team died and he then farmed with oxen two years, and in 1889 purchased three horses for $625. He removed to his tree claim in the northeast quarter of section 30, township 146, range 65, in 1894, and erected a set of substantial and commodious buildings thereon, and in 1896 sold his homestead farm and purchased land adjoining his tree claim. He now owns three hundred and twenty acres of land, and engages in grain and stock raising, and the past few years has devoted the greater share of his attention to the raising of sheep and cattle. His farm is nicely located and one of the pleasant spots of the neighborhood in the summer months.

Our subject was married in Indianapolis, Indiana, in January, 1883, to Miss Nanie Roberts, who was born and raised in Virginia. Her parents were of Irish descent, and her father, James Roberts, was a plantation owner. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. DeBolt, as follows: Lorena, Mattie Pearl and Edna R. Mr. DeBolt holds membership in the Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Maccabees. He takes an active part in affairs of a public nature, and has held numerous local offices of trust. Politically he is a Democrat.

JOSEPH L. KERR, one of the pioneer settlers of Stutsman county, is among the few men who braved the dangers and discouragements of early settlement in North Dakota, and have remained to become prosperous and substantial citizens. Although he labored many years, crops were destroyed repeatedly, and it was not until after many others had given up the struggle that success came to Mr. Kerr. He is now the owner of a fine estate, and enjoys the comforts of rural life. He resides near the village of Corrinne, and his farm is well equipped and nicely located. He also possesses property in Illinois.

Our subject was born in Sharron township, Richland county, Ohio, July 20, 1844. His father, William Kerr, was born in Ohio, where his parents located in 1810, and where the grandfather of our subject built the first flouring mill, during the pioneer days of the state. The family originally were from the Highlands of Scotland. The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Louisa Funk, was born in America and was of Holland-Dutch descent. Her grandfather was one of the first German Lutheran preachers in Pennsylvania.

Our subject was the second in a family of three children, and was raised on a farm near Shelby, Ohio. He enlisted in the Union army in September, 1861, and became a member of Company I, Fifteenth Ohio Infantry, and joined the Army of the Cumberland, and participated in all the battles with that army. He was at Shiloh, Stone River, where he was taken prisoner and confined in Libby prison three months, and then exchanged, after which came Chickamauga, Mission Ridge, Franklin and Nashville. He was also in Sherman's campaign around Atlanta, and after the surrender of Lee he was sent to Texas, and was mustered out of the service in November, 1865, after four years and four months of brave and active service. Returning from the war, he attended Oberlin College one year, and later went to Iroquois county, Illinois, where he engaged in farming five years, and in 1871 moved to Milford and established a hardware store, in which business he was engaged two years. He spent four years at Watseka, Illinois, shipping corn and other produce, and in the spring of 1883 went to Stutsman county, North Dakota. He entered claim to the southeast quarter of section 32, in township 144, range 02, and erected a 10x12 shanty, and resided there eight or ten years. The first year he bought a team of ponies on time and broke land for others, and his first crop in 1884 was from but five acres of land. The following year hail destroyed his crops and the next four or five years drouth caused a total failure of crops. He raised twenty-five hundred bushels of wheat in 1891, since which time he has prospered in grain raising. He now has four hundred and eighty acres of land, all of which is under cultivation, and he has a well-improved estate, including a complete set of substantial and commodious farm buildings, all necessary machinery, windmill and plenty of stock.

Our subject was married, November 27, 1866, to Candas Roberts, who was born and raised in Shelby, Ohio. Mrs. Kerr's parents came from Hartford, Connecticut, and she and our subject attended the same school in Ohio, and Mrs. Kerr later taught school in that state. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Kerr, as follows: Frank, an electrician at Butte, Montana; and Etta, who is attending school at Oberlin, Ohio. Mr. Kerr is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Republican, and has cast his vote for the principles of that party since his majority.

TAYLOR. Among the men who are gaining a good support by tilling the soil of Fairmount township, Richland county, and incidentally laying aside a competence for future years, this gentleman is an able representative. He has resided in Richland county since his boyhood days, and is well known as an industrious and honest citizen, who always has the welfare of his community at heart.

Mr. Taylor was born in Van Buren county, Michigan, on a farm, August 2, 1862, and was the fourth in a family of seven children born to Jason P. and Armina (Vose) Taylor, notice of whom appears in the history of William H. Taylor, the brother of our subject.

Herbert B. Taylor went to Dakota with his parents in the spring of 1879. He was reared on his father's farm and received a common school education, and has pursued the life of an agriculturist. He resided with his parents until 1886, when he began farming for himself, and is now the owner of one half-section of land on section 5, in Fairmount township. He is successful as a farmer and has a well-improved estate.

Mr. Taylor was married March 31, 1886, to Miss Luella M. Stewart, a daughter of the late Lathrop and Emeline (Allen) Stewart, both of whom were natives of Pennsylvania. Mrs. Taylor's parents went from Dane county, Wisconsin, to Richland county, North Dakota, in the spring of 1879, and settled in Center township, where the mother died in March, 1887. The father survived her many years and made his home with our subject until his death, in December, 1898. They were the parents of eleven children, six of whom grew to maturity. Mrs. Taylor was the youngest daughter and was born in Dane county, Wisconsin, August 27, 1864. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, two of whom died in infancy. The surviving children bear the following names: Armina E., Elsie N., Achsah F. and Hubert H. Mr. Taylor is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a young man of energetic spirit and honest dealings and is widely and favorably known.

OLIVER S. HANSON. As an all around prominent man of Traill county, there is probably no one of its citizens who more justly deserves the title than Mr. Hanson. He is the leading spirit in the financial and social growth of Buxton and its surrounding country, and is enjoying the result of a well-spent career. He resides on his pleasantly situated farm near that city, and his home is one of elegance and comfort, being fitted with all modern improvements, heated by turnace and finished in hard wood. He is president of the State Bank of Buxton, and is also extensively interested in farming.

Our subject was born in Iowa, June 3, 1862, and was the fifth in order of birth in a family of nine children, born to Hans and Moren (Simonson) Hanson, both of whom were natives of Norway. His parents emigrated to America in 1851, and became early settlers of Allamakee county, Iowa, where their marriage occurred, and where the father now resides.

Our subject went to Hillsboro in November, 1881, and spent three years in the position of book-keeper for the Hillsboro National Bank. He went to Buxton in January, 1884, at the age of twenty-one years, and established the bank of Buxton and became cashier. He purchased the business within a few months and conducted it as a private bank, and in 1890 re-organized as the State Bank of Buxton, and has since been president of the institution. The bank conducts a general banking business, and occupies a quaint structure in design, built of native stone. Mr. Hanson has a valuable farm about one mile north of Buxton, where he has erected his handsome residence and makes his home.

Our subject was married, in 1884, to Miss Anna Scully, who died in 1889. Mr. Hanson married Miss Louise Sorlie, in 1892. Three children have been born to this union, as follows: Harley, Merwyn and Verdine. Mr. Hanson is a supporter of the Republican party, and is well known as a temperance worker. He is a member of the Republican state central committee and has been absent from few state conventions. He served as a delegate to the St. Louis convention, and has been thoroughly identified with the movements of his party, but has not allowed his name to be brought forward as a candidate for office. He devotes most of his time to the duties of his position and business affairs, and his success is well merited.

JOHN Y. EASTERBROOK, one of the pioneer settlers of Stutsman county, has made a success of the pursuit of agriculture, and is now one of the substantial men of his locality, and the owner of a well-improved tract of eight hundred acres. He is possessed of excellent ability and business tact, and despite many discouragements which he has encountered, he has steadily progressed in his work, and now enjoys a comfortable home and the highest esteem of his associates.

Our subject was born on a farm in Ontario, Canada, in 1854, and was the fourth in a family of seventeen children, and was a son of George Easterbrook. His father was born in Devonshire, England, and was a tailor by trade, and came to America with his parents when a boy, and the family settled in Halton county, Ontario, Canada. The grandfather of our subject, Elias Easterbrook, was a farmer by occupation. The mother of our subject was born in Yorkshire, England, and came to America with her parents when a girl, and her father was a farmer by occupation.

Our subject was raised on his father's farm in Ontario, and received a country school education. After attaining his majority he rented one of his father's farms and engaged in farming there four years, and in the spring of 1881 went to Nebraska and bought railroad land. He did not meet with success there and in March, 1882, went to North Dakota, and settled near Jamestown. He rented and purchased land and engaged in farming in several localities in Stutsman county, and in 1893 located on the "Greene farm," on section 19, township 140, range 64, where he now resides. He and his brother-in-law, George Fletcher, farmed together ten years, and also operated a threshing machine, which our subject still operates and has an outfit now of his own, and for the past fifteen years has followed that line of work each season. He is now the owner of eight hundred acres of land, and has five hundred and ten acres under cultivation. Part of his machinery, hay, feed and so forth, with the exception of his shanty and household goods, were destroyed by prairie fire in 1882, and his separator, valued at two hundred dollars, was lost by fire in 1896. He now has a well-improved and well-stocked farm, and has made a success of his calling.

At the age of twenty-three years our subject was married to Miss Mary Fletcher, who was born and raised in the same county as himself. Her father was a native of England, and came to America, where he engaged in farming. Mr. Easterbrook and wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and our subject is class leader and choir leader, assistant Sunday school superintendent and instructor of the Bible class, and takes an active part in the social affairs of that denomination. Mr. Esterbrook is an independent national voter, and favors the Prohibition principles.

He has devoted his maturer years to farming, and has met with unbounded success, and is now proprietor of a fine farm the improvements of which he has placed thereon by his own efforts, and has gained the highest esteem of those among whom he labors.

Our subject is a native of Staffordshire, England, and was born July 22, 1837. His parents, John and Jane (Bond) Bayliss, were natives of the same shire and spent their lives in their native place. His father was an iron worker. Our subject has one sister living.

Mr. Bayliss was reared and educated in England, and there learned the trade of puddler and steel maker, and followed it there until 1869, when he emigrated to America and located in Cleveland, and from there removed to Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and later to Youngstown, Ohio. He resided in the last named place until 1879, and then went to Cass county, North Dakota, and entered a claim as a homestead to land in section 10 of Clifton township and has resided there since that date. He now has four hundred acres of good land, and is one of the substantial men of his locality.

Eight children have been born to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Bayliss, as follows: William B., Mattie, now Mrs. George Phillips, of Chicago; Benjamin C., James H., Annie A., now Mrs. E. Lloyd, of East Chicago; Minnie M., George A. and Edith F. The family were members of the Presbyterian church, and are highly respected in the community in which they reside. Mr. Bayliss takes an active interest in the welfare of his community, and has served in various local offices, including justice of the peace, school offices and member of the township board. He is independent in political sentiment and is a man well versed on the topics of the day and wields an influence for good in his locality. He went to North Dakota without means and is now one of the prosperous men of Clifton township, and well merits his success.

J. H. PLATH, Sr., one of the earliest settlers of Davenport township, Cass county, successfully pursued farming in that locality for many years and acquired a comfortable home and an enviable reputation. He is a native of Hanover, Germany, and was born June 14, 1821. He now resides in Galena, Illinois, with his aged wife, and is retired from active pursuits, and enjoys the result of a well-spent career. A portrait of Mr. Plath is shown on another page.

The parents of our subject, John H. and Freda (Goldwin) Plath, were natives of Nerstine and Hanover, Germany, respectively, and lived and died in their native land. The father was twice married and two sons were born to each marriage, who now make their home in the United States.

Mr. Plath was reared and educated in Germany, and there learned the carpenter's trade, and June 5, 1851, emigrated to America and settled in Galena, Illinois, where he followed his trade three years. He then moved to Buffalo county, Wisconsin, and followed farming there until the spring of 1878, when he entered a homestead claim to land in section 6, of Davenport township, Cass county, North Dakota, and was among the first to begin the cultivation of land in that locality. He followed his calling there until 1894 and then retired to a comfortable home in Galena, Illinois, and the property is now conducted by his son, J. G. Plath. He owned three and a half sections of land on which he made excellent improvements, and his farm furnished a home of more than usual comforts and is among the finest pieces of property in Davenport township.

He was born June 21, 1871, in Buffalo county, Wisconsin, and was reared in North Dakota. He was married, in 1894, to Josephine Bucklin, a native of Minnesota. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Plath, named as follows: Harry W. and Gladys M. Mr. Plath has served on the township board in Davenport township two years, and is one of the rising young men of Cass county.

HAMLIN F. EATON, residing on section 27, in Port Emma township, Dickey county, is one of the successful and prominent stock raisers of that region. His farm is equipped with every arrangement for lessening labor and the economical conduct of the place, and is the best improved estate in that part of the state. Mr. Eaton is a gentleman of intelligence and is an influential citizen, working for the better interests of his community, and enjoys an enviable reputation.

Our subject was born in Trenton, Maine, August 12, 1838, and was a son of Herrick M. and J. L. (Hopkins) Eaton. His father was born in Sedgwick, Maine, and followed the sea until he attained his majority, when he entered the Theological Institute at Bangor, Maine, from which he graduated, and entered the Methodist ministry. He was an eminent divine and preached in several of the New England states, his ministry extending over more than half a century. Three sons were born to Rev. and Mrs. Eaton, as follows: Amos H., Russell W. and Hamlin F., (our subject).

His father being stationed at various places in the state, our subject moved to several places until fourteen years of age, when he entered the Maine Wesleyan Seminary at Kents Hills, and pursued his studies there four years. After leaving the institution he established a family boarding school for boys at Kents Hills, and conducted it until he was forty-five years of age. During the time he removed the institution to Norridgewock, in 1866, and the school constantly increased under his management until six to seven teachers were engaged in the work. Our subject left the school in charge of his brother, Amos H., in October, 1861, and answered the call for troops, and enlisted as lieutenant in the Fourth Maine Battery, and served with distinction in the Army of the Potomac. He was mustered out in Washington, D. C., in 1863, and returned to Maine to again take charge of his school, which he conducted until 1882. He then sold his interests and removed to Dickey county, North Dakota, spending the fall of that year in traveling throughout the territory. He settled on the farm on which he now lives in the spring of 1883, and first conducted a wheat farm, but finding the soil and climate undesirable for that line of farming became interested in the raising of stock. He invested in cattle, and now has a fine herd of Herefords on his ranch, and also keeps a large flock of fine sheep. His buildings are of the most substantial and convenient design, and excellent water is bountiful from artesian wells.

Our subject was married in Kents Hill, Maine, in 1861, to Elizabeth Goodwin. One daughter was born to Mr. and Mrs. Eaton, who bore the name of Fannie. Both mother and daughter passed away in 1866. Mr. Eaton married Lizzie S. Wheeler, a native of Norridgewock, in that city in 1867. Mrs. Eaton was born in 1840. Five children have been born to bless this union, as follows: Mrs. Charles S. Brown, of Oakes; Mrs. E. G. Barnes, residing about two miles from her parents; H. W., a graduate of the Fargo Agricultural College, who is now reading law at the University of Minnesota; Jane H., attending school at Oakes; and Ruth A., also a student at Oakes. Mr. Eaton is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Masonic fraternity.

CHRIST LUDWIG, Among the most enterprising citizens of Barnes county, North Dakota, are those of foreign birth, who have brought into this fertile and productive country the thrift and economy of the old world. Among these there is no figure that stands out more prominently in the history of the county than Mr. Ludwig, who is meeting with marked success in his farming operations on section 22, township 142, range 58 west.

He is a native of Germany, born in 1835, and is a son of Jacob and Mary Ludwig. At the age of fourteen years he emigrated to the United States, and spent two years in New York. He then traveled quite extensively, stopping in various states, until 1879, when he came to Barnes county, North Dakota, and took up land on the southwest quarter of section 22, where he still resides. He has met with excellent success in this state, and is now the owner of a whole section of land, which he has placed under excellent cultivation and improved with good buildings, that stand as monuments to his thrift and industry.

Mr. Ludwig wedded Miss Mary Stainman, who was born in Greene county, Wisconsin, in 1863, and they now have a family of ten children, all living. Since casting his first vote Mr. Ludwig has been a stalwart supporter of the Republican party, but has never found time to devote to public affairs, though he always faithfully performs his duties of citizenship, and is one of the most public-spirited citizens of his township.

JOHN R. BLACKMER, proprietor of one of the fine farms of Fairmount township, Richland county, is a representative citizen of that region. His industry and integrity are well known, and from a limited start he has acquired a goodly fortune. His career has been marked with persistent and faithful efforts to advance the interests of those for whom he worked, while furthering his personal interests, and he has gained an enviable reputation.

Our subject was born in Hamilton township, Van Buren county, Michigan, June 25, 1860, and was the only son born to John R. and Mary S. (Bidlack) Blackmer. Mr. Blackmer had one sister, named Jeanette. Our subject was reared in his native place and attended the common schools. He followed farming in Michigan until the spring of 1882, when he went to North Dakota, then a territory, and for three years was foreman on the "Fairview farm," located in Mooreton township. He engaged in farm work for others until he settled on his present estate, on section 20, in Fairmount township, about 1888, and he is now the possessor of eight hundred acres of land. He uses modern methods and machinery for the lessening of labor incident to farm life, and has surrounded himself with the comforts of life.

Our subject was married in Wahpeton, North Dakota, December 1, 1885, to Miss Minnie L. Stebbins, a daughter of Hon. S. E. Stebbins, of Devillo township. Mrs. Blackmer's mother bore the maiden name of Maggie King. She was a native of Scotland, and Mr. Stebbins was born in Vermont. A sketch of their lives appears on another page of this work. Mrs. Blackmer was born in Winona county, Minnesota, December 1, 1861. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Blackmer, as follows: Walter S., John R., J., and Nettie E. Mr. Blackmer is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, and Knights of Pythias. He is an earnest worker for the advancement of his community, and the station of Blackmers was named for him, in appreciation of his services in the upbuilding of that region.

He went to Cass county, Dakota, in the spring of 1880, and dealt in horses for some time, and in 1882 located butcher shops in Lisbon, and also dealt in stock. He was one of the early day business men of that place, and aided in its upbuilding. He secured land in 1882, and he and his brother did an extensive business in farming, well digging, and dealing in horses and cattle. He located on his farm to reside in 1895, and is now the fortunate possessor of four hundred and eighty acres of land, and crops about eleven hundred acres annually. He has a flock of three hundred sheep, which proves profitable, and intends following stock raising more extensively. His farm is well supplied with water, and range is plentiful, and the farm is admirably adapted to that line of agriculture.

Our subject was married, in 1895, to Miss Addie Lebo. Mr. and Mrs. Trumbull are the parents of one daughter, upon whom they have bestowed the name of Ruth. Mr. Trumbull is one of the prominent men of his community, and has served in various important commissions. Our subject was born in Waseca county, Minnesota, July 6, 1856. His parents had emigrated to the pioneer home in Minnesota and had not erected a dwelling when he was born in the emigrant wagon. He was the oldest of a family of eight children born to Berguff and Julia (Anderson) Olson, and his father now lives on the homestead farm.

Our subject was reared on the farm and remained there until after attaining his majority, when he began work with a grading crew and later was engaged as a brakeman on the M. & St. L. Railroad. He followed that work one year and then began dealing in horses, and in April, 1881, went to Dakota. He arrived at Hillsboro without resources, and secured a position as the first foreman of the Gould farm, which he held two years. He removed to Buxton in the fall of 1882, where he handled the collection business about two years and then established the implement business which he still conducts. He purchased the livery barn and Buxton hotel in 1888, and has prospered in every enterprise which he has undertaken.

He followed copper mining in Michigan until 1881, and then went to North Dakota and located on section 4, in township 140, range 63, and erected a 12x16-foot frame shanty and barn and lived on the farm alone during 1881 and 1882, when he proved his claim and in 1883 returned to Michigan, and in the spring of that year went to New Mexico and took charge of a silver mine, which he operated three years as manager, and was efficient in the work. He returned to his homestead in North Dakota in 1887, as his health would not permit him to remain any longer in New Mexico, and he then began farming on his place. His crop the first year was taken by grasshoppers and the crop of 1888 was bountiful and the proceeds from the same placed him on the road to prosperity. He is now the owner of six hundred and fifty acres of land, and cultivates about five hundred acres annually, and has a complete set of consin, November 15, 1856, and was the second in a family of seven children, born to Alonzo and Sarah (Breed) Dye. He settled in that part of Ransom county, which is now known as Sargent county, May 24, 1882, a few miles distant from his present home. There he engaged in wheat raising and gradually increased his investments in stock, but the supply of water failed, and he was forced to seek a new location, when he secured a farm which he operated until 1900. He is now operating a farm on section 34 township 134, range 55. He had a fairly good start in dairy cows, and devoted himself to cheese making. He introduced the Holstein cattle, and of late has been changing to the Galaway, and as range is abundant is intending to change to beef cattle to some extent. He was instrumental in starting a creamery at Milnor, but this is at present idle for lack of patronage, although hope is held that it will yet prove a success.

Our subject was married, in 1885, to Miss Alice R. Gates. Mr. and Mrs. Dye are the parents of five sons, named as follows: Arthur E., Perley H., Verner A., Floyd L. and Dexter G. Mr. Dye is one of the enterprising and progressive men of his community, and enjoys an enviable reputation. In political faith he is a Republican and Prohibitionist. A portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Dye appears in connection with this sketch.

GEORGE JACOBSON, one of the early settlers of Pleasant township, is engaged in various enterprises in that locality and has a pleasant home near the village of Hickson, and justly deserves the title of a prominent citizen of Cass county. He is one of the successful farmers of his township and enjoys the fruits of his labors in that locality.

Our subject was born in Iowa December 26, 1858. His parents, Andrew and Julia (Oppen) Jacobson, were natives of Norway and emigrated to America about 1854 and settled in Iowa, where they still reside. Seven sons and three daughters were born to them, who reached the age of maturity, of whom our subject and one brother are now residing in Cass county, North Dakota. Three children died in infancy.

Mr. Jacobson was reared in Iowa and received liberal educational advantages there and assisted on the farm until 1878, when he went to Fargo, North Dakota, and the same year entered a homestead claim to land in section 28, of Pleasant township, Cass county. This was wild land at the time, but he has brought it to a high state of cultivation and now owns one section of land as a homestead and a half section in Nelson county. He also deals in farm machinery and buys grain at Hickson in company with Lewis Hicks. His business ventures have proven profitable in every instance and he is now considered one of the solid men of Cass county.

Our subject was married, in 1880, to Marie Blihi, a native of Norway. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Jacobson and are named in the order of birth, as follows: Alice S., Gustie, Gilbert, Mable, Cornelia, Ruth, Myrtle and Harry. The family are members of the Synod Lutheran church and are highly esteemed in the community in which they have made their home for so many years. Mr. Jacobson is one of the public-spirited men of his locality and in all moves calculated to upbuild or in any way to enhance the worth of the public enterprises of his community he gives hearty support. He is supervisor of his township and has filled various local offices from time to time. Politically he is a Republican and is strong in his convictions and keeps pace with the times in public matters.

JACOB H. HOHL. This name is borne by a prominent citizen of Eddy county whose residence is at New Rockford. Since taking up his home in North Dakota his life has been one of continued successes in every direction and in every line in which his faculties have been directed, and he has acquired a comfortable competence and a good name. He is proprietor of the leading lumber yard of the town and is also engaged extensively in general farming near New Rockford.

Our subject was born on a farm near Ft. Madison, Lee county, Iowa, and is the eldest in a family of four sons born to Martin and Christine (Schmidt) Hohl, both of whom are natives of Germany. His father came to America in 1843 and his mother emigrated to this country when twenty years of age. Mr. Hohl received a country-school education and assisted with the work on the home farm in Iowa and attended college one summer at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, at the age of seventeen years. He began working at the age of thirteen in a general store and after attending college was employed in a general store at Primrose, Iowa, where he remained as a clerk for three years. After having attended college at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, he came to North Dakota in 1883 and located at Valley City, where he worked in a general store over three years, and in 1886 came to New Rockford and in company with N. J. Hanson established a general store and also a lumber yard for the Gull River Lumber Company. Mr. Hanson conducted the store and our subject had charge of the lumber business. This yard was among the first in the town, as was also the store among the first, and the mercantile business was started in a 24x60-foot building, one of the largest in the town at that time. Business prospered and it was necessary to enlarge the building in 1893, and a 24x90-foot store and a forty-foot warehouse has been used since. Mr. Hanson died in October, 1898, and after his death our subject disposed of the store to Rodenberg Brothers, and Mr. Hohl devotes his attention to the lumber business and enjoys an extensive trade. He owns twelve hundred acres of land in partnership with F. E. Owen, and the land is devoted to general farming, with grain raising in the lead.

Mr. Hohl was married, in 1893, to Miss Margaret E. Wren, who was born and raised in Ontario, Canada. Mrs. Hohl's father, William Wren, is of Scotch-English descent, and died in Canada in February, 1900. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hohl, as follows: Gladys E., Berenice A. and Janet L. Mr. Hohl is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and the Mystic Shrine, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Modern Woodmen of America and Knights of Pythias. Politically he is an independent voter, but prior to 1896 was identified with the Democratic party. He is a man who keeps pace with the times, and lends his influence for good local government.

PETER M. MATTSON, state's attorney of Eddy county, North Dakota, is a gentleman of excellent business ability and education and is widely known as a citizen of true worth. He is a native of Sweden, but has given up the home of his birth to seek a broader field of labor, and has made a success of his career in his adopted land.

Our subject was born in Sweden, May 30, 1861, and was a son of Matts and Bengta (Fyjers) Mattson. His father was a farmer by occupation and came to America in 1879, and settled in Goodhue county, Minnesota. Our subject was raised on a farm in his native land, and attended the common schools and after emigrating to America attended the high school at Vasa, Minnesota. He began farming in Eddy county, North Dakota, in 1884, and was thus engaged until 1892. He erected a claim shanty 12x16 feet, and lived therein all alone and farmed the first two years with oxen. He removed to New Rockford, North Dakota, in 1892, and established the machinery business, and began the study of law. He was elected clerk of courts on the Republican ticket, and served two years, and during the winter of 1895-96 took a course in law in the State University of Minnesota. He was admitted to practice in the supreme court in North Dakota, in September, 1896, and the same year established an office in New Rockford. In the fall of 1898 he was elected state's attorney for Eddy county on the Republican ticket, in which capacity he is at present serving.

Mr. Matson was married, in 1887, to Miss Kate Peterson, a native of Sweden. Three children have been born to bless the home of Mr. and Mrs. Mattson. Mr. Mattson holds membership in the Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Modern Woodmen of America and American Yeomen. He is a man of practical nature and energetic spirit, and has made a success of whatever enterprise or vocation he has entered into, and is classed among the public-spirited men of that region.

HON. EBENEZER P. PERRY, one of the best known attorneys of Dickey county, North Dakota, makes his home in Ellendale, where he has enjoyed an extensive practice. He is also connected with various enterprises in that thriving city, and is one of the potent factors in the prosperity enjoyed in that locality.

Our subject was born in Rushford township, Allegany county, New York, February 20, 1825, and was a son of Ebenezer P. and Hannah (Speer) Perry, the former a native of Massachusetts and the latter of New Hampshire. His father was a farmer by occupation, and moved into western New York during its early settlement. He was a soldier in the war of 1812.

Our subject was the youngest of ten children, and completed his schooling in the district schools of his native place and Rushford high school. He left New York when sixteen years of age and went to Whitmanville, Michigan, where he taught school two years, and began reading law under Redfield, a prominent attorney of Cassopolis, Michigan. He then returned to New York and made Rushford his home until about 1848, when he moved to a farm in Linden township, Cattaraugus county, New York, where he resided five years, and then went to New London, Wisconsin, and engaged in the mercantile business with his brother Robert, the brother conducting a hotel while our subject had charge of the other business, their interests being in common. They also, in company with Mr. Swift, operated a flouring and saw-mill and general store at Whitmanville, Michigan, which was destroyed by fire. Afterward our subject began the practice of law in New London, having been admitted to the bar in Waupaca county, Wisconsin, in 1857. At the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in Company E, Second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered into the service at Madison, June 11, 1861. They went at once to Washington, thence to Arlington Heights, where they joined the Thirteenth, Sixty-ninth and Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers, and became a part of the Army of the Potomac. Our subject was wounded at the battle of Gettysburg on the first day of that bloody fight, and also participated in the battle of Bull Run and many of the important engagements of the war. He was transferred to Company D of his regiment, in March, 1862, and commissioned second lieutenant, and rapidly rose to the rank of captain. He commanded Company D from the battle of Antietam until the regiment was mustered out, and he was finally discharged at Madison, Wisconsin, July 29, 1864. He then returned to Wisconsin and began the practice of law at New London, where he continued until 1882, when he went to Ellendale, North Dakota. He has built for himself a lucrative practice, and is also proprietor and editor of the "North Dakota Record" (in partnership with his son, H. H.), which was established in August, 1894.

Our subject was married, in 1848, to Miss Sophia White, a native of Rushford, New York. Mrs. Perry died in Waupaca county, Wisconsin, leaving two children: Florence, now deceased; and Charles, residing in Clintonville, Wisconsin. Mr. Perry married Caroline Krause in New London, Wisconsin, in 1806. Mrs. Perry is a native of Germany. Four children were born to this union, as follows: Ella, Oscar, Laura and Hector H. The last named is now associated with his father in the newspaper work of the "North Dakota Record," and is clerk of court of Dickey county. The paper is a Populist sheet, and the official paper of the county and city. Mr. Perry takes an active interest in public affairs wherever he makes his home, and while a resident of Wisconsin was chosen a member of the legislature of that state in 1867, during which term of office he did very efficient work. He cast his vote for the Republican ticket from 1856 to 1872, since which time he has voted the Democratic ticket. He is a man of deep thought and advocates reform principles.

HECTOR H. PERRY, associate editor and joint owner with his father, Ebenezer P. Perry, of the "North Dakota Record," is one of the prosperous and enterprising young men of Dickey county. He is also clerk of the court of Dickey county.

Our subject was born in New London, Wisconsin, August 20, 1876. He completed his education in his native place, after which he went to Michigan, and there learned the art of type-setting and printing. He then returned to New London and followed his trade there until 1894, when he went to Ellendale, North Dakota, soon after which he and his father commenced the publication of the "North Dakota Record," which paper they have since edited and published.

Mr. Perry was married, in 1897, in Ellendale, North Dakota, to Miss Jennie Montey, a native of New York. Mr. Perry is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, Knights of Pythias and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was elected clerk of the court of Dickey county in the fall of 1898 on the Populist ticket. He is popular with the people throughout the county, and deservedly so.

JOSEPH BUCHHEIT. Griggs county is well known for her pleasant and well regulated farms, and one of these fine tracts is owned and operated by the subject of this review. He is a pioneer settler of that region and has aided materially in bringing the country to its high state of civilization. Mr. Buchheit resides in section 10 in Willow township, and has acquired a comfortable home by dint of faithful efforts and good management.

Our subject was born on a farm in Waterloo county, Ontario, Canada, May 2, 1854, and was the seventh in a family of thirteen children, six sons and seven daughters, born to Jacob and Mary (Buchheit) Buchheit. His parents were natives of Germany, and later emigrated to America, and died at an advanced age in Indiana.

When our subject was eight years of age he removed with his parents to St. Joseph county, Indiana, and they settled on a farm near South Bend, where he attended school and assisted his father until sixteen years of age, when he took a position with Clark, Whitson & Company, of Mishawaka, Indiana, and remained in their employ five years. He then returned home and remained for some time, and in 1880 went to Griggs county, North Dakota. After looking over the county he returned to Mishawaka, and followed clerking there about one year, and in the spring of 1882 again went to Griggs county, North Dakota. He then filed claim to the northeast quarter of section 10, in Willow township, as a pre-emption, since which time he has resided thereon. He is now the possessor of seventeen hundred acres of land, all of which is well improved, and from a limited capital he has gained a comfortable income and is numbered among the substantial men of his locality.

Our subject was married in Fargo, North Dakota, in 1887, to Miss Ella M. Minnick, a native of Indiana, and a daughter of Jacob and Mary Minnick. Mrs. Buchheit's father was a farmer by occupation. Mr. Buchheit takes an active part in local affairs of a public nature, and has held various offices in his township and county. He is the present chairman of the board of county commissioners, having been elected in that capacity on the independent ticket. He is a man who has the interests of his community at heart, and enjoys the confidence and esteem of his fellowmen.

JOSEPH MILLER. Among the foreign-born citizens of Clifton township, Cass county, who have acquired a comfortable home and an enviable reputation by dint of their earnest industry and strict honesty, the gentleman above named is entitled to foremost mention. He has a fine estate and his home is in section 22, where he has resided for many years and has followed farming.

Our subject is a native of Austria, and was born June 24, 1851. His parents, Anton and Theresia (Vaith) Miller, were natives of Austria and spent their lives in their native land. Two sons and two daughters were born to them, and our subject is the only member of the family in the United States.

Mr. Miller was reared to the age of sixteen years in Austria and in 1867 came to the United States and remained in Chicago, Illinois, three years and then spent some years in various places in the west. He went to Steele county, Minnesota, and later to Wabasha county, where he followed farming until 1880 and then went to Cass county, North Dakota, and entered land as a homestead in Howes township. He resided there about two years and then removed to his present location in Clifton township, where he has held continuous residence since first locating there. He now owns a section of good land and is one of the well-to-do men of his community.

Our subject was married in Minnesota, in January, 1874, to Rosa Langer, a sister of Frank and Joe Langer, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere in this work. Nine children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Miller, as follows: Rosa, now Mrs. H. Shaw of Barnes county; Emma, Lottie, Hubert, Elizabeth, Bertha, Alice, Joseph and Edna. Mr. Miller takes an active part in local affairs of a public nature, and has filled various local offices, as assessor, member of the school board, town board, and minor offices. He is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. Politically he is a Republican and is firm in his convictions.

CHARLES W. CONNOR, the fortunate owner of one of the fine estates of Riverside township, in Steele county, is well known as an agriculturist who is doing an extensive business. His farm consists of four hundred acres of land, and he makes his home on section 22, in township 145, range 57. He is a man of wide experience and intelligence and is held in high esteem as a public-spirited citizen.

Our subject was born in Madison county, Illinois, April 19, 1860, and was the elder of the two sons born to Silas F. and Susan A. (Hanson) Connor. The mother died in 1899 and the father is still living. The families of both sides are of English extraction. The father was engaged in the manufacture of the Alton Pitts Separator, and patented and introduced an arrangement for easy raising and lowering of the concave.

Our subject was given a liberal education, and attended one term at Shurtleff College, Upper Alton, and then was employed in the grocery store of his father, and a portion of the time during 1880, 81-82-83 he traveled for the Walter A. Wood Company. He made a trip to Dakota in August, 1881, and inspected the land from Buffalo, in Cass county, and with one companion drove to Elsbury, and through the southern part of what is now Steele county. During the trip he accidentally received a flesh wound from a shot gun. He located a tree claim in Hope township, and the following winter took a course at the Missouri State University at Columbia, in surveying and kindred studies, and then joined a surveying party in charge of the sounding boat while surveying the Missouri river from Lexington to Booneville, after which he took charge of quarter boats on government work, riprapping the river banks at St. Charles, Missouri. He went to Steele county, North Dakota, and began farming in the spring of 1884, and the following fall was elected county surveyor, and was again elected in 1894, since which time he has held that position. He conducts a farm of four hundred acres of land, all but one hundred sixty acres of which he has acquired by purchase, and is one of the substantial men of his community.

Our subject was married, in 1886, to Miss Florence Brown, of Alton, Illinois. Two sons have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Connor, as follows: Francis and Clyde. Mr. Connor is the present treasurer of Riverside township, and since taking up his residence in Dakota has been actively interested in the welfare of his township and county. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Politically he is a Republican.

JACOB FAUST. This well-known resident of Barnes county is one of our leading Swedish-American citizens, and in his successful business career he has shown the characteristic thrift and enterprise of his race. Beginning with no capital except that acquired by his own industry he has become the owner of a valuable farm of thirteen hundred and twenty acres in Hobart township, his home being on section 2, and he is to-day one of the most prosperous citizens of his community.

Mr. Faust was born October 18, 1844, on what was known as the Ansober farm near Falkenberg, Sweden, and is a son of Tora and Enger (Anderson) Faust, also natives of Sweden. The father, who was a farmer and carpenter by occupation, died in that country in 1858, but the mother survived him for many years and came to America to spend her declining days with her children. Her death occurred in Barnes county, North Dakota, in 1888.

Our subject attended school in his native land until he attained his fourteenth year, and during the succeeding thirteen years worked on different farms near his boyhood home. In 1871 he decided to try his fortune in the new world where he believed better opportunities were afforded ambitious and enterprising young men, and accordingly he came to the United States in that year. He first located in Warren, Pennsylvania, where he worked in sawmills for nine years, during which time he erected in North Warren an elegant residence at a cost of $1,700. In the spring of 1880 he came to Barnes county, North Dakota, and filed a claim of one hundred and sixty acres on section 2, Hobart township, where he has since made his home. Here he has steadily prospered, being one of the most industrious, progressive and energetic agriculturists of the township, and it is doubtful whether there is a better farm in Barnes county than the Jacob Faust place, which is now under a high state of cultivation, while the buildings are all that money and mechanical skill can produce. Mr. Faust has five brothers, viz.: Charles J., Aaron, John, Otto and Peter, all living in Barnes county, and all farmers excepting Charles.

During his residence in Warren, Pennsylvania, Mr. Faust led to the marriage altar, in 1874, Miss Anna C. Petersen, who was born in Halmstad, Sweden, October 20, 1854, and to them have been born six children, as follows: Amanda J., Tilda V., Carl J., John A., Walter D. and Fred V. The three first named were all born in Pennsylvania, the others in Barnes county, North Dakota, and all are still living with the exception of Walter D., who died in infancy. Portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Faust appear on another page. Socially, the family is one of prominence in the community where they reside, and their hospitable home is always open for the reception of their many friends. In 1894 Mr. Faust, with his wife and youngest son, Fred V., took a trip to Sweden, visiting old friends, and stayed at the home of Mrs. Faust's parents for three months, stopping on their return trip at New York and in Pennsylvania. The trip each way was made on a Cunard boat—the Lucania and Campania. While Mr. Faust does not give much of his time to politics, he is unwavering in his support of the Republican party, and has served as a member of the school board. Fraternal-ly he belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and, religiously, is a member of the Swedish Lutheran church. His uprightness, integrity and public-spiritedness have won him the confidence and esteem of his neighbors, and he is classed among the most respected representative citizens of Barnes county.

REV. GUSTAV OFTEDAL, pastor of the United Lutheran church, of Buxton, and three outlying churches, has accomplished creditable work since taking charge in Dakota, and has endeared himself to his people. He is a gentleman of excellent education, refined, and earnest in his work, and his success is well merited.

Our subject was born in Stavanger, Norway, February 22, 1856, and was the fifth in a family of seven children born to Sven and Gunhild (Stokke) Oftedal. His father was a teacher and cashier of a bank, and his sons were given the best educational advantages.

Our subject entered the university in Christiania and completed a law course, graduating with the class of '72, and afterward practiced law a few months, and then became president of the telegraph station at Arendal. He began the study of theology in 1875, intending to devote himself to church work in Norway; but before completing his studies he was called to Minneapolis, Minnesota, in 1877, and soon took charge of one of the leading congregations of that city and St. Paul, and after four years went to Alexandria, Minnesota, and there assumed charge of seven congregations in three different counties. He went to Richland county, North Dakota, in 1884, and in 1889 to Buxton. The Buxton United Lutheran congregation, of which he now has charge, was organized in 1887 by Saugstad, and consisted upon the arrival of our subject of fourteen families. Mr. Oftedal reorganized the congregation with the same number of families, and it has steadily increased to twenty families. A handsome church building was erected in 1893, and is acknowledged as the finest edifice of the kind in that part of the county, and is valued at five thousand, five hundred dollars. Grue congregation, which is also under the charge of our subject, consists of about thirty families, and the church building is located on section 24, in East Buxton township, and is valued at three thousand, five hundred dollars. St. Olaf congregation consists of about thirty-three families, with a church building valued at five thousand, five hundred dollars, located in Americus township, in Grand Forks county. North Prairie congregation consists of seventeen families with a church building on section 16, in Logan township, valued at two thousand, five hundred dollars. These congregations represent about one hundred families, and property, including churches and parsonages, valued at about twenty thousand dollars, all without debt and erected since 1892, under the supervision of our subject. The growth of the denomination has been remarkable, and their pastor commands the respect and love of those among whom he labors.

Our subject was married, in 1873, to Miss Octavia Berg. Ten children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Oftedal, as follows: Hans P., a medical student; Gunhild, a well-known teacher of Trail county, and a musical student of the Minneapolis Conservatory; Trygve, deceased; Arne, also studying medicine in Hamline University; Gustav, who is devoting himself to farming; Sverre, at home; Axel; Trygve; Laura and Olga. Mr. Oftedal is a staunch Prohibitionist, and is an earnest worker for that cause.

JAMES CALDWELL. This gentleman is well known as one of the prosperous farmers of Clifton township, Cass county, who is doing an extensive business. His real estate amounts to eight hundred acres, and he is a representative agriculturist and citizen.

Our subject was born in Ontario, Canada, September 6 1860. His parents, Andrew and Jane (Davis) Caldwell, were natives of Scotland. The father emigrated to America in 1840 and the mother in 1858, and they became residents of Cass county, North Dakota, in 1881, and are well known as early settlers of that locality where they still make their home. They are parents of six sons and two daughters, all of whom reside in Cass county.

Our subject was raised and educated in Canada, following farming there until 1881, when he went to Cass county, North Dakota, and settled in Highland township. He resided there until 1892, when he took up his residence in Clifton township and has resided there since that date. He now has eight hundred acres of land all well improved and under cultivation and has met with success in his chosen vocation.

Our subject was married, in 1882, to Dora Fowler, a native of Canada. Five children have blessed the home of Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell, who bear the following names: Andrew, Agnes S., Ralph, William F., and Albert. Mr. Caldwell is chairman of the town board and assessor, in which capacity he has served several years, and is actively interested in the affairs of his township and county. He holds membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Ancient Order of United Workmen, and Knights of The Maccabees. Politically he is a Democrat and is firm in his convictions, and deservedly popular with the people among whom he makes his home.

MYRON J. HOLLEY, a well-known farmer of Fairmount township, Richland county, has followed that calling in Dakota with success, and now has one of the first farms of the vicinity. He also follows the carpenter's trade more or less, and many of the buildings of that region are his work. He makes his home on section 19, and good management and industry are apparent in the general condition of the place as well as every detail.

Our subject was born in Columbia, Jackson county, Michigan, April 3, 1847, and was reared on his father's farm in that county. His father was a carpenter and farmer, and our subject learned the former trade, which he followed many years. He remained at home until he reached his majority, and then went to Washington county, New York, where he was engaged at carpenter work until the fall of 1873, when he went to Wabash county, Indiana. Here he was employed in a grain elevator two years, and then entered the employ of the Wabash Railroad Company, as bridge builder, and was thus employed about four years, until he went to Dakota in the spring of 1881. He entered a homestead claim to one hundred and sixty acres of land on section 19, in Fairmount township, southwest of the village of Fairmount. He has since made that farm his home, and divides his attention between farming and following his trade.

Our subject was married in Washington county, New York, January 7, 1875, to Miss Alice Wiltse, who was born in Adamsville, Washington county, New York, May 8, 1851. Mrs. Holley died at the residence in Fairmount township, Richland county, January 14, 1896, leaving one child, Harold J. Mr. Holley is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and was the first master of Fairmount Lodge, No. 37. He takes an active interest in all matters of local importance, and is the present chairman of the board of supervisors of Fairmount township, of which body he has been a member for the past five years. As a member of the school board for six years he has advanced the educational interests of that locality, and is a man respected wherever he is known.

GEORGE A. KELLETT. Strict attention to the various details of his work, supplemented by industry and honesty, has placed this gentleman in a foremost place among the agriculturists of LaMoure county. He has been a resident of the state for seventeen years and of section 24, in Grand Rapids township, for five years, and has gained the highest esteem of his associates, while his home farm affords him every convenience and comfort of rural life.

Our subject was born in Cayuga, Cayuga county, New York, September 2, 1849, and was the second in order of birth in a family of eight children, four sons and four daughters. His parents, Peter and Mary (Leonard) Kellett, were natives of Ireland, and his father was a linen weaver by trade. He emigrated to America prior to the Civil war, and during that struggle was a soldier four years, as a member of Company H, Fourteenth Michigan Infantry.

Our subject, when a child, moved with his parents to Ypsilanti, Michigan, where he attended school and learned the trade of sign and carriage painting, which he followed until the spring of 1883. In the spring of that year he went to Dickey county, North Dakota, and filed claim to land near Yorktown, where he resided until 1894, and then disposed of his interests in Dickey county and went to his present location, three miles north of La Moure. He has continued to improve his property, and now owns one of the best farms in the township.

Our subject was married in Washtenaw county, Michigan, near the village of Lodi, February 5, 1870, to Miss Lydia Beckley. Mrs. Kellett was born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, November 12, 1853, and was the eldest of three children, one son and two daughters, born to Guy and Electa (Crouch) Beckley. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Kellett, the three eldest of whom were born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, the fourth near Bay City, that state, and the younger four in Dickey county, North Dakota. They bear the following names: Ira; Daisy, now Mrs. A. D. Hale, of Madison, Wisconsin; Guy; Bert; Roy; Frank; John and George. Mr. Kellett is one of the pioneer settlers of the state, and has taken active interest in the development of that region, but does not enter into political affairs.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CASSELTONTON was organized in 1882 with a capital stock of sixty thousand dollars, and the following officers: President, W. F. Holmes; vice-president, J. W. Fisher; cashier, ex-Governor A. H. Burke. The capital stock was reduced to fifty thousand dollars in 1898, and one hundred shares retired. Mr. Holmes was president till 1894, when he was succeeded by H. P. Watts, and Mr. Watts by Myron A. Baldwin. Mr. Fisher was succeeded by William Strehlow, and he by M. A. Baldwin, and Mr. Baldwin in turn by S. H. Knight. Mr. Burke was succeeded as cashier by E. H. Paine, now deceased, and he by W. F. Holmes, and later Mr. Baldwin assumed the position and his successor was Mr. Langer, who now fills that position.

The mother of our subject, whose maiden name was Eliza Hutchinson, was of Irish birth, and some of her relatives were Irish landlords. She died in North Dakota in the spring of 1897 and the father of our subject died in 1898. Three brothers of our subject are now farming in Dakota and two sisters are married and living on Dakota farms. Mr. Reid's brother, John, came to America in 1885, at the solicitation of our subject and located in North Dakota and the family joined them there one year later, our subject being instrumental also in their emigration to this country and their locating in North Dakota.

James Reid was the eldest in a family of nine children and was raised on a farm and attended the public schools. He left home at the age of nineteen years and came to America and after working in Philadelphia as a laborer for about five years he returned to his native land to oversee matters pertaining to property there. He again came to Philadelphia in 1882 and spent one year in that city, going thence to Stutsman county, North Dakota. He took as a homestead the northwest quarter of section 4, township 143, range 62, and as a tree claim the northwest quarter of section 14, township 144, range 63. He lived alone in his shanty one summer and his first crop was not a good yield and was a total loss on account of hail. He had a team of mules, which was his first team and he still owns them and can work them on his farm yet. He resides on his place alone and has every convenience of modern farming, including a commodious barn, granary, chicken houses, windmill for pumping and grinding, and all necessary machinery. He has three hundred and twenty acres of land, sixty acres of which is pasture and the balance is under cultivation. A wind storm destroyed a 30x60-foot barn on his place in 1892 and fourteen head of cattle were lost. Mr. Reid has a thorough knowledge of his vocation and during 1895-1896 operated an experimental farm for the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault St. Marie Railroad.

Mr. Reid is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America and is widely and favorably known throughout that locality. Politically, he is a Republican and is a man who stands firm for the principles of his party.

CHARLES HEIN, one of the trustworthy public officials of Richland county, makes his home in the village of Hankinson, near which place he owns four hundred acres of land. Mr. Hein was born in Germany, March 5, 1856, where he lived until twelve years of age, when he came to America with his parents, Gottlieb and Amalie Hein. They landed in New York City, in June, 1868, and at once proceeded to Oshkosh, Wisconsin, where they resided three years and then returned to New York City, remaining there one year. The family then went to Dakota and settled in Belford township, Richland county, where the father died in February, 1895.

Our subject was engaged in farming in Belford township until 1890, when he removed to Hankinson and engaged in the mercantile business and also stock buying until the fall of 1898, when he disposed of his business. He has erected a substantial dwelling in the village and has gained a comfortable competence.

Mr. Hein was married, in Richland county, North Dakota, November 10, 1882, to Miss Fredericka Schroder, who was born in Dodge county, Wisconsin, March 27, 1860. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Hein, named as follows: Louisa E., Emma A., Louis C., Charles G., Richard H., Alfred A., Lora M. and Mina A. Henry Plath, Jr.; cashier and general manager, H. S. Crothers; assistant cashier, W. H. Shure. The board of directors consists of the above named gentlemen with the exception of Mr. Plath.

The institution has an average deposit of twenty-five thousand dollars and does a general banking business and under the guidance of Mr. Crothers is meeting with success and is fast taking its place among the best financial institutions of the county.

H. S. Crothers, cashier and general manager of the State Bank of Davenport, is a gentleman of excellent business qualifications and he has entered heartily into the labors of conducting the institution with which he has been connected from its founding. He is a native of Adams county, Wisconsin, and was born February 9, 1868. He was reared and educated in his native state and completed his studies with a business course at Valparaiso, Indiana. He followed the profession of teacher four years and in 1890 went to North Dakota and settled in Page, and soon afterward entered the Bank of Page as assistant cashier. He filled this position six years and resigned at the end of that time to accept his present position with the State Bank of Davenport. He has been successful in his business methods and is one of the well-known young men of the county.

Mr. Crothers was married, in 1898, to Edith Wisner, a native of Northwest Territory. Mr. Crothers is a member of the Masonic fraternity and Ancient Order of United Workmen.

LUCIUS C. DAY, who has acquired a comfortable competence by dint of honest industry and well-spent career, is planning to enjoy a retirement from active labors and makes his home in the village of Hope, where he is well known and will be a welcomed citizen. He is at present residing on farm on section 10, of Colgate township, and is one of the pioneers of that township.

Our subject was born in New York, February 24, 1840, and was the fourth of eight children born to the union of Hezekiah and Eliza (Bussey) Day. His father was of English birth and fought in the war for liberty and his old musket is an heirloom of the family.

Our subject was reared to farm work and spent the year of 1860 in Florida and the South and becoming thoroughly impressed with the gravity of the war situation, he was one of the first to volunteer from his state, and April 28, 1861, enlisted in Company E, Twenty-fourth New York. Fredericksburg was the first battle in which he participated, after which followed the second battle of Bull Run, Antietam, South Mountain, Gaines Mill. He returned home in 1863 and after a rest of a few months joined Company D, Eleventh New York Cavalry. Many skirmishes followed and a heavy engagement took place at Liberty, Louisiana. He was mustered out of the service September 30, 1865, with the rank of corporal. Returning to the home farm he engaged in farming thereon until the spring of 1883, when he went to North Dakota and entered claim to land in Colgate township, Steele county. At that time, looking from Hope in a southeasterly direction, there were but four claim shanties to be seen, and the first three years of his residence in Dakota our subject lived in the village of Hope and conducted his farm near there. He then erected the upright part of his present house and removed to the country, where he now has a complete set of good farm buildings and all the conveniences of modern farming. His farm furnishes an abundance of water from a depth of twenty-four feet and he has never experienced a failure of crops, the poorest yield averaging twelve bushels of wheat per acre.

Our subject was married, in 1878, to Miss Laura A. Kellogg. Mr. Day is a man of active public spirit and has served as county commissioner for the first district during two terms. He is a Republican in political faith and is a man who is well versed on the topics under daily discussion and is widely and favorably known.

Our subject was born near Tronjeim, Norway, September 8, 1843, and was the eighth in a family of nine children, five of whom are now living. His parents, Soren and Bergoite (Bjorn) Larson, were natives of Norway. Our subject served an apprenticeship of five years in a blacksmith shop and in July, 1865, started to England, with the intention of establishing a wagon manufactory, but found no good location and then emigrated to America, arriving at New York, August 15, 1865. After a short time he started for the copper mines of Michigan, and worked there at his trade eighteen months, but tiring of the isolation of the mines he went to Chicago and from there to Allamakee county, Iowa, where he purchased a country shop. He took a trip westward through St. Paul to Big Stone Lake in 1868 and the following year started for Colorado, but stopped in St. Ansgar, Mitchell county, Iowa, and there opened a shop during the boom times. In the spring of 1878 he went to Belmont, Traill county, North Dakota, where he secured a mule team and looked for land and entered claim to the southwest quarter of section 2 as a tree claim and in the spring of 1881 removed to Buxton with his family and worked at his trade, meanwhile improving his farm for about three years. His health then began failing and he removed to his farm in 1884 and has resided there since. He has added to his acreage and now owns and operates four hundred and eighty acres. He has an artesian well and good buildings and has met with unbounded success in agricultural pursuits.

Our subject was married, in 1874, to Miss Matilda Davis. Mr. Sorenson died in 1898, aged forty-six years. Eight children were born to this union, as follows: Annie, now Mrs. A. Sorley; Samuel deceased; Henry; Maria M., teaching in Traill county; Minnie, deceased; Martin; Samuel and Otto. Mr. Sorenson is a member of the Lutheran church and is actively interested in educational matters.

MICHAEL M. LENHART, one of the early settlers of Davenport township, has a well-improved estate and has gained an assured position and the highest esteem of his followmen by his earnest efforts toward success in his calling.

Our subject was born in Baden, Germany, August 22, 1849, and was a son of Michael and Leona (Hawk) Lenhart. His parents were natives of Baden, Germany, and emigrated to America in 1853 and settled at St. Louis, Missouri, and from there went to Fountain City, Wisconsin. His father was a farmer by occupation and died in Minneapolis, where also the mother died. They were the parents of seven children, of whom our subject is the only one in North Dakota.

Mr. Lenhart was reared and educated in Wisconsin and resided there until 1879, when he went to Cass county, North Dakota, and entered a homestead claim on section 8, in Davenport township, where he has resided continuously since. He was among the first settlers of that region and now has a half-section of choice land in Cass county and a tree claim in Richland county. His buildings on his home farm are modern in design and finish and form a home of more than usual comforts and with other improvements of the place make a valuable estate.

Our subject was married, in Wisconsin, in 1872, to Anna Plath, a native of Illinois. Five sons, all of whom are living, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Lenhart, as follows: Emil P., Christ R., Frank A., George A. and Benjamin B. He was a pioneer of Dakota, and has aided in the development and growth of the great agricultural interests of the locality in which he has chosen to reside for so many years.

Our subject was born on a farm in Washara county, Wisconsin, November 22, 1854, and was the oldest son and third child in a family of ten children, born to Nels and Anna (Anderson) Nelson. His father is still living on the old home farm, where our subject was reared and labored until his twentieth year. He then worked out in that vicinity and was thus engaged for several years, and then went to Goodhue county and worked there in the woods of Wisconsin until 1880. In the spring of that year he went to South Dakota with a team for the purpose of looking over the country with a view to locating there, and after his arrival worked on the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad. He wished to look further before taking land and with several companions crossed the country to Fargo by team. They were young men who had been reared in a wooded country, and the trip across the prairie was not only pleasing but novel in its experiences. So called city after city was passed, though consisting of one or two shanties and the inevitable sign in glaring letters, "land office." Our subject selected the land which comprises his present homestead in the fall of 1880, and filed claim to the land in the spring of 1881. He then removed to his farm accompanied by his wife and his brother, and he built a 16x20-foot shanty, which was his dwelling until the log house 16x26 feet was constructed. This last named building forms the main part of his present home. He has prospered in his chosen calling, and is surrounded by the comforts of country life.

Our subject was married in the spring of 1880, to Miss Bertha Marum, a native of Norway. Mrs. Nelson died in 1896. She was a lady of true womanly grace, and presided over his household with dignity and kindness. She was a true helpmeet during the pioneer days and patiently endured the hardships incident to their early life in Dakota, looking to the prosperous times which attended them in later years. She was a christian lady whose labors in the church and charitable cause are sadly missed, and by her exemplary life gained a host of friends throughout that community. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Nelson, as follows: Bertha, deceased; Bertha, deceased; Norris, Steven, Arthur, and Lulu. A portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson appears on another page. Mr. Nelson has interested himself heartily in all matters pertaining to the advancement of the township and county, and has rendered valuable aid in the affairs of local government. He was elected county commissioner for the second district, in the fall of 1883, and was among the first to fill that position. He was elected county treasurer of Steele county in the fall of 1894 and his popularity and efficient services are best evidenced by the fact that he was re-elected to that office, serving two terms. He is a Republican in political sentiment, and has served as delegate to county and state conventions of his party.

FRANK PHILLIPS, a public-spirited and enterprising member of the farming community of Moran township, Richland county, has devoted the greater part of his life to the pursuit of agriculture. He has been exceptionally fortunate and is proprietor of as good a farm as can be found in Moran township, his homestead being located there on section 12.
